Backgrounds. Jeremiah's long prophetic ministry (627–586 B.C.) coincided with the reigns of five successive kings in Judah: Josiah (641–609 B.C.), Jehoahaz (609 B.C.), Jehoiakim (609–598 B.C.), Jehoiachin (598–597 B.C.), and Zedekiah (597–586 B.C.). Jeremiah was well acquainted with loneliness and was forbidden to marry and have children (Jer. 16:1–2). The social and political establishment opposed his messages (e.g., 1:18; 26:7–24) and put him in the stocks (20:2) and in prison (37:15–16; 38:1–13, 28). People in his hometown and family rejected him (11:18–23; 12:6), but he was sustained by his awareness of God's presence (1:8, 19; 14:8–9; 15:20) and the power of the divine word (1:9; 15:16, 19; 20:8–9; 23:29).

The most intense phase in Jeremiah's ministry occurred during the sustained historical crisis in 605–586 B.C. that climaxed in the destruction of Jerusalem (15:19; cf. 1:9; 5:14). Speaking candidly and with divine power, his relentless prophecies of judgment were intended to lead the people to repentance. Repentance was needed because the cause of the crisis was the people's desertion of the covenant God. Jeremiah's messages eventually enabled the remnant of Israel to survive Judah's fall and the Exile. Jeremiah directed them toward God's future and gave them a hope that was founded on God's grace and power (cf. 29:11).

Jeremiah's call to ministry was closely connected with Babylon's rise to supremacy. On his death, Ashurbanipal left behind a weak Assyrian Empire (627 B.C.). The same year, Nabopolassar became king in Babylon and soon subjugated Assyria. Thus, Jeremiah's appointment in 627 B.C. as a prophet to the nations (1:5) coincided with the rise of the Neo-Babylonian power that would dominate Judah politically for about seventy years. The ministry of Jeremiah covered five historical periods.

1. Before Josiah's Reform (629–622 B.C.). Jeremiah 2:1–6:30 possibly derives from these early years (cf. 3:6). The passage is characterized by (a) strong denouncements of Judah's idolatry (e.g., 2:1–3:5); (b) harsh announcements of impending punishment "from the north" (e.g., 1:13–16; 4:5–5:17); and (c) messages of hope and salvation (e.g., 3:6–4:4; 4:14).

2. Josiah's Reform (622–609 B.C.). Inspired by a book found in the temple (perhaps Deuteronomy), King Josiah launched a reform based on covenant fidelity to the Lord (2 Kin. 23:4–25). The call of Jeremiah five years earlier is congruent with this reform (Jer. 1:4–19). The messages in Jeremiah 11:1–8 (on covenant faithfulness) and 17:19–27 (on the Sabbath) were probably proclaimed to support the reform. Unfortunately, Josiah fell in a battle near Megiddo in 609 B.C. at the hands of Pharaoh Necho II (2 Kin. 23:29). A biblical record notes that Jeremiah mourned his death (1 Chr. 35:25).

3. The Reigns of Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, and Jehoiachin (609–597 B.C.). Josiah's son Jehoahaz (or Shallum; Jer. 22:11; 32:7; 35:4) is mentioned unfavorably (22:10). After only three months as king (2 Chr. 36:2), Pharaoh Necho II put him in chains and appointed another of Josiah's sons, Eliakim, as king, renaming him Jehoiakim (2 Kin. 23:34; 2 Chr. 36:4). Jehoiakim's reign marks a turning point for Jeremiah. He now faced persecution and imprisonment, alternating with brief periods of freedom (Jer. 20:1–2; 26:8–9; 32:2–3; 33:1; 36:26; 37:12–21; 38:6–13). Jehoiakim's hostility arose from Jeremiah's repeated message that Judah was destined to fall at the hand of Babylon (36:1–32). Jeremiah attacked the syncretistic temple cult and urged the people to be faithful to Yahweh and worship Him alone. This created strong opposition from the royal establishment (e.g., 38:1–28; cf. 7:1–20:18; 22:1–30; 25:1–14).

In 605 B.C., Nabopolassar's son and successor, Nebuchadnezzar, crushed the Egyptians at Carchemish on the Euphrates (Jer. 46:2–12), and Babylon exercised authority over Western Asia for the next seventy years. The same year, Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem, humiliated Jehoiakim, and carried off Daniel and his companions to Babylon (Dan. 1:3–6). In 597 B.C., Jerusalem was defeated again, and the rebellious Jehoiakim was deported in chains to Babylon. His eight(teen?)–year-old son Jehoiachin ruled only three months (2 Chr. 36:9; cf. 2 Kin. 24:8). Jeremiah's prediction of his captivity (Jer. 22:24–30) was later fulfilled (24:1; 29:1–2; cf. 52:31–34).

4. The Reign of Zedekiah and Jerusalem's Destruction (597–586 B.C.). Young Mattaniah, Jehoiachin's uncle and another son of Josiah, was renamed Zedekiah and placed on Judah's throne by Nebuchadnezzar in 597 B.C. (37:1; 2 Chr. 36:9–14). Zedekiah sometimes befriended Jeremiah and sought his advice (Jer. 37:3–17) but otherwise allowed the prophet's enemies to mistreat and imprison him (38:1–28). When Nebuchadnezzar blinded and deported Zedekiah, he appointed Gedaliah as governor of Judah, and Jeremiah chose to remain in Judah (40:1–6). When Gedaliah was murdered in a conspiracy (41:1–9), his entourage feared Babylonian reprisals and fled to Egypt, taking Jeremiah and Baruch with them (43:4–7).

5. Sojourn in Egypt (586–?). Limited information about this period comes from 43:8–13 and 44:1–30. Because the book was not written in chronological order, Jeremiah's last recorded words are probably found in vv. 24–30. The prophecy about Nebuchadnezzar's defeat of Pharaoh Hophra was fulfilled in 568–567 B.C. (v. 30; 46:26). The circumstances of Jeremiah's death are unknown, but a Jewish tradition maintains he was stoned to death (cf. Heb. 11:36–37).

Two factors are significant for understanding the setting of the book of Jeremiah—namely, the internal conflicts between various parties in Jerusalem and Judah and the successive Babylonian deportations (cf. Jer. 52:28–30). The narration covers (a) the Sinai covenant going back to Moses; (b) the memory of earlier apostasies and prophetic judgments, at least since Amos and Hosea; (c) royal claims to power; (d) the temple theology promoted by the various groups in the priesthood; (e) pro-Babylonian and pro-Egyptian parties; (f) the influential families of nobility that were in tensions with the king; and (g) the interests of rural village elders. These contrasting voices had engaged in an ongoing dispute about these central questions: Who had trustworthy insight regarding the nations and Judah, and who could give safe guidance regarding faith, worship, ethics, and political power? Jeremiah maintained that faithfulness to the covenant with God was the key to public well-being and that a violation of such faithfulness would bring disaster to the community. This is the position of the prophetic movement (e.g., Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah, and Zephaniah), and Jeremiah consciously included himself in this movement (28:8–9).

Secondly, the promises of hope and salvation for the faithful, prompted by the successive Babylonian deportations, grew in importance. After the fateful destruction of Jerusalem and Solomon's temple, the book of Jeremiah was read both as an explanation of the disaster and a promise of hope for redemption and a new beginning. This influenced the central position of the so-called Book of Comfort (30:1–33:26) and the pivotal role of the prophecy of Babylon's fall (50:1–51:63).

Theology and Purpose. Jeremiah's theology is nowhere outlined or nicely articulated. Instead, the book reveals a living and moving relationship with God, a poetic mind devoted to rich and varied imagery, personal reflections, and biographical accounts. Even so, a number of theological themes are clearly emphasized.

1. The Covenant God. Yahweh was the God of the covenant with Israel (7:23). His faithfulness to the covenant meant that (a) He held His people accountable when they violated it and (b) He gave grace and hope to those who were faithful and to those who returned to Him. Yahweh's faithfulness to the covenant—which included blessings on the faithful and curses on the unfaithful (cf. Deut. 28)—is understood as His righteousness and loving-kindness (4:2; 9:24). The covenant provides the basis for God's messages of salvation and judgment against His people.

According to the Sinaitic covenant, God saved His people and showed them His undeserved love and mercy. The people were to faithfully respond in love, trust, and obedience. God would show mercy but would also punish rebellious lawbreaking with judgment. This belongs to God's righteous ordering of the world based on His character and will (cf. Ex. 20:4–6). In keeping with the common ANE practices of covenant making, the covenant with Israel included curses and blessings on the party that broke or kept the agreement (Deut. 28). In regard to vengeance, the principle of retribution is in view (Jer. 20:10–12; cf. Ex. 21:12–27; Deut. 19:21), especially as a reason for the judgment against Babylon (e.g., Jer. 50:15, 28; 51:11, 24, 35–36, 49, 56). However, God has the right, power, and wisdom to exercise mercy according to the circumstances. His judgment serves certain purposes and may be overruled by the same purposes if His will so requires. Thus, Jeremiah's prophecies of judgment have a sequence of purposes: (a) to declare the judgment God had in store for Judah; (b) to warn them and lead them to turn from their evil condition (25:5); (c) to instruct the people that God's judgment is a response to human behavior (i.e., judgment is a consequence of their actions); (d) to evoke a sense of inevitability since the judgment was impending; (e) to communicate God's willingness to forgive repentant sinners (36:3) and restore the covenant; and (f) to confirm the truth of the word of God. Thus, the relationship between God and His people was the central concern, not merely the approaching punishment.

The theological foundation of judgment may be summarized as follows: (a) God is the Sovereign Lord of human history; (b) God is also sovereign in the realms of nature and morality; and (c) human beings may choose a life in relationship with God or one without Him, and both history and nature will, at God's command, either reward or punish them for their choices (see "God's Judgment in the Prophets," p. 981).

Some of Jeremiah's prophecies anticipate a complete restoration of Israel (23:1–8; 30:10–11, 18–22; 31:10–14, 23–25), a gathering of the remnant from the nations (23:3–4; 30:10–11; 31:10–14), the raising up of a Davidic righteous "branch" (23:5–6), and a new exodus (vv. 7–8; 50:33–34). These promises of a blessed and hopeful future grow in importance at each deportation of Judean exiles to Babylon (see 52:28–30), especially after the disaster in 586 B.C. They are, however, coupled with realism, a demand for patience, and a fundamental appeal for faithfulness to God.

The covenant formula (i.e., God's declaration that made Him Israel's God and Israel His people) runs throughout the book (see 7:23; 11:4; 24:7; 30:22; 31:1, 33; 32:28). Since this declaration was predictive, its future realization was anticipated and experienced through the prophetic word. Such a promissory word enables the faithful to wait for God while already experiencing its future blessing. The divine promise of a lasting agreement and union between God and His people will find its ultimate fulfillment when God's mission on earth is completed (Rev. 21:1–5).

Covenant

The term "covenant" (Heb. berit) occurs twenty-three times in Jeremiah, always in the sense of a legally binding agreement between two parties (cf. e.g., 11:2–3, 6–8; 14:21; 33:20–21, 25; 34:8). Of central importance, however, is the covenant between God and Israel. This is either the Lord's covenant with the fathers after the Exodus from Egypt (e.g., 11:10; 14:21; 22:9; 31:32), which had been broken, or His new and future covenant with the remnant of Israel (e.g., 31:22, 31–33; 32:40; 50:5). A "covenant" created a legal, contractual obligation outlining requirements (usually in writing) that were to be faithfully maintained by all parties. The legal and obligatory status of the covenant explains the juridical aspect of God's just judgment against Judah. A covenant could also be promissory when the superior party Himself took on an obligation. This is exemplified in Jeremiah by God's promises of a future, everlasting covenant with His people (e.g., 31:31–34).

2. The Mutual Knowledge between God and Humans. Jeremiah speaks in an unparalleled manner about God's knowledge of him and his knowledge of God. Jeremiah knew that God foreknew him (Jer. 1:5). Often in his prayers, he appeals to the God who knows him (12:3; 15:15; 17:16). God's knowledge of Jeremiah presupposes a relationship. But human beings may also know God (9:24). Humans have a profound need to know God, and Jeremiah reproached Judah for not knowing Him (2:8; 4:22; 5:4; 7:9; 8:7). The nations who did not yet know God would be exhausted and fall (51:58, 64). They had not yet found the rest that life with the Lord inevitably brings (6:16; 30:10; 31:2; 46:27; 50:34). To know God is to have hope, and hope brings rest.

3. God and the Sanctuary. The covenant theology included the promise that God would dwell with His people in the land He had given them. The Jerusalem temple eventually became His dwelling place under David and Solomon. God's presence rendered the sanctuary most holy. However, according to Jeremiah, the false gods set up in Jerusalem (and in the local sanctuaries in the cities of Judah) contributed to the defilement of the sanctuary and caused God to abandon it. This is described as Israel's abandonment of the Lord. The judgment that would destroy the sanctuary would confirm that God was no longer living among His people—in other words, Israel's disobedience had put an end to the covenant (cf. 5:19; see "The Temple in Chronicles," p. 541). However, the disappearance of the sanctuary did not end God's relationship with His people. It continued through the prophetic word.

The sanctuary plays an important role in Jeremiah's admonitions to the exiles in Babylon. The hope of restoration at the end of the seventy-year Babylonian captivity incorporates the restoration of God's honor and glory associated with His temple (Jer. 14:21; 17:12; 31:6–7; 51:50–51). God would respond to what Babylon had done in Zion (51:28) and address the shameful fact that foreign invaders had entered God's holy sanctuary (v. 51). Thus, God's punishment of Babylon (50:1–51:63) was to be God's act of vengeance for His temple (50:28; 51:11, 24). God's people would again worship Him in the temple in Zion when He would restore His honor and glory before the nations (50:4–5; 51:10; cf. 31:6–7, 12). The nations would no longer look favorably toward Babylon's chief god (51:44)—they would look favorably toward the Lord in Zion (3:17; cf. Is. 2:2–4). In essence, this theological insight continues in Daniel (cf. the little horn's pride, oppression, and desecration of the sanctuary in Dan. 8:9–14) and Revelation (cf. the appeal to the nations to give honor and glory to God in Rev. 14:6–13, turning away from "Babylon" to the true God).

4. God and the Nations. God is Lord of all nations (Jer. 1:4–10; 3:17; 4:2; 5:15; 10:7, 10; 18:7–10; 25:17–28; 46:1—51:63). The Creator gives dominion over the earth to whom He deems appropriate (1:5, 10; 27:5; cf. Dan. 2:21, 37–38, 44; 5:18–21; 7:26–27; Acts 17:24–28; Rev. 19:11–21). His power to give dominion to the nations or remove it is expressed in the central metaphor in Jeremiah's call as a prophet: to pluck up, tear down, and destroy, but also to build and plant (Jer. 1:10; cf. 18:1–11; 31:28). Thus, in the context of judgment, God made Babylon His agent in the punishment of His disobedient covenant partner, Judah (27:6–9). In the context of salvation, however, God admonished His remnant people not to fear Babylon because He was able to deliver them (42:11–12). When Babylon's allotted time would run out, God would turn against her and punish her (50:1—51:63), and world dominion would be given to another people (51:11, 28).

5. God as Creator. God's sovereignty over the nations is founded on His creation of all that exists (10:12–16; 32:17–25; 51:15–19). He is all-powerful (32:27; 48:15; 51:57) and omnipresent (23:24). Since God created the earth and all the living creatures on it (27:5), it is His to govern as He desires (vv. 5–11; cf. 18:1–11). He is in charge of the created universe with its fixed order and purpose (5:24; 8:7; 14:22; 27:1–22; 31:35–37). Therefore, those who hope in the Lord will be blessed (17:7). Under the covenant, Israel had promised to acknowledge God as Creator (Ex. 20:8–11) and care for its neighbors (Deut. 5:12–15) by keeping the Sabbath day. God called Jeremiah to remind the people of this by proclaiming in all the gates of Jerusalem to keep the Sabbath holy, just as He had commanded their ancestors (Jer. 17:22).

6. Hope and the Word. God's faithfulness includes His promise to David (33:17). The messianic hope would be fulfilled, and the King of righteousness would be Lord over God's people, bringing salvation and safety to Judah (vv. 15–16). This promise was not fulfilled immediately after the return from the Babylonian Exile, but Christian faith sees its fulfillment in Jesus Christ (Rom. 3:21; Rev. 19:11). This promise was given to Jeremiah through the divine word. Speaking the word of God was Jeremiah's destiny (e.g., Jer. 1:4, 11, 13; 2:1, 4, 31). The fact that the noun "word"/"words [of God]" occurs over 150 times in the book (besides verbal expressions like "the Lord says") underscores the introductory note to Jeremiah as one to whom the word of the Lord came (1:2). The word has God's intention and will in it. It is alive with divine energy and sovereignty, and conveys judgment at times but also, ultimately, hope. It is not only powerful and is experienced like a fire (5:14; 20:9; 23:29) or a hammer that breaks the rock in pieces (23:29), but it is also "a joy and delight" (15:16).

The word can be "seen" (2:31) because there is no distinction between the spoken word and the performed word (the Heb. dabar designates not only "word," but also "thing" or "matter"). Human beings have no control over the word; it cannot be conjured up by their will (17:15; 23:18). It is given, at times, even against one's own wishes (1:6–8; 15:15–21; 28:6–7). True prophets must subject themselves to God's word in obedience—listening and waiting. At certain points, Jeremiah waited for extended periods of time (42:1–7). The fulfillment of the word of God is certain (1:12; 28:9; 32:24). Many of Jeremiah's predictions were soon fulfilled (e.g., 16:15; 20:4; 25:11–14; 27:19–22; 28:15–17; 29:10; 34:4–5; 43:10–11; 44:30; 46:13; 51:41–44), while others were to be—or will yet be—fulfilled in another era (e.g., 23:5–6; 30:8–9; 31:31–34; 33:15–16).

Jeremiah was concerned with the integrity of the word of God. In conflicts with the popular prophets of the day, he was compelled to understand the nature of God's revelation to him. They too spoke in the name of the Lord, but Jeremiah denied that they had been sent (23:21, 32), that they had stood in the divine counsel (vv. 18, 22), and that God had spoken to them (v. 21). Their word lacked true hope. But Jeremiah was aware that he stood in the line of God's true prophets (7:25; 25:4; 26:5; 29:19; 35:15; 44:4) and that his word, coming from the Lord, would shape history as a beacon of hope.

7. The Prophetic Word. God's word was conveyed to Jeremiah by revelation. This term is not found in the book, and the experience is not described in any detail. Most often, the word of the Lord simply "came to" Jeremiah, and the prophet then proclaimed what the Lord "says" (e.g., 2:4; 19:2). Obviously, matters relating to the prophetic experience were widely known and accepted in Jeremiah's setting and did not need an explanation. When God reveals His message, a prophet simply "knows" the word of the Lord. Therefore, the sign of a true prophet is an intimate relationship with God and a knowledge of Him. The closest we come to Jeremiah's prophetic experience is through the reference to his standing in the council (or counsel) of the Lord (23:18, 22). This refers to an intimate dialogue between God and His prophet (cf. Gen. 18:22–33; Amos 3:7) in which the prophet listened attentively to the word (Jer. 23:18).

God's word is powerful and holy (5:14; 23:9, 29) because it carries His power and holiness. Jeremiah takes it in his mouth or writes it on a scroll with awe and trembling. Governed by this understanding, Jeremiah does not distinguish in his prophetic speeches between the linguistic elements purely from God and those from himself. God's speech is, in a sense, beyond human control and can only be accessed through the prophet. The awesome power of God's speech cannot be received and communicated by just any human being but only through mediation by a duly appointed prophet of the Lord (1:4–19; cf. Is. 6:1–13).

The prophet is called to receive God's word (cf. Jer. 23:18) and then to make it presentable in human form so that it can be efficiently communicated (i.e., spoken or written) in the language and speech forms of the intended audience. Ellen White caught this point of prophetic speech when she said, "The Bible points to God as its author; yet it was written by human hands; and in the varied style of its different books it presents the characteristics of the several writers. The truths revealed are all 'given by inspiration of God' (2 Timothy 3:16); yet they are expressed in the words of men. The Infinite One by His Holy Spirit has shed light into the minds and hearts of His servants. He has given dreams and visions, symbols and figures; and those to whom the truth was thus revealed have themselves embodied the thought in human language" (GC v. 3).

The Lord's words and Jeremiah's words are one. This explains why it is often impossible to separate them in the text. God is the originator, and Jeremiah the preacher and text producer. For example, in the call of Jeremiah, the divine word was given by God (Jer. 1:4, 11–13), then spoken (i.e., formulated) by the prophet (vv. 9–10), performed or fulfilled by God (v. 12), then recorded by the prophet. Jeremiah's message is that hope, peace, and true well-being are found only in faithfulness to God, the Creator of the world and Israel's covenant God. The book of Jeremiah revolves around God's rule and the supremacy of His kingdom (cf. 1:10; 46:1). Since any relationship between God and human beings is based on who God is and what He wants for them, His promise is therefore valid at all times: He desires to bring peace and future hope (29:11).

Literary Features. In terms of word count, Jeremiah is the longest book in OT prophetic literature. One of the extraordinary features of Jeremiah is the use of a variety of literary forms and text types with striking examples of poetry and prose at a high artistic level. Having received a priestly upbringing (1:1), Jeremiah displays an intimate familiarity with the temple literature from the book of Psalms. He also draws on passages and themes in the Pentateuch (esp. Deuteronomy) and the historical and prophetic books (e.g., 2 Kings, Isaiah, and Habakkuk). He expresses his prophetic insight through extraordinary artistic skill in speeches, prayers, and reflections.

The book of Jeremiah belongs to the literary genre of prophecy. Features of this genre found in the book include announcements of disaster with or without elements of the covenant lawsuit (Heb. rib): indictments, judicial sentences, and predictions of judgment (2:1–37; 29:30–32; 50:1–51:58); sermons (7:1–15); predictive prophecy (30:1–33:28); various narratives: history (39:1–44:30), biography (26:1–24), autobiography (11:18–19; 13:1–11), symbolically enacted prophecy (18:1–11), call narrative (1:4–19), and vision report (24:1–10); various kinds of instruction (11:1–17; 17:19–27; 35:12–19); letters (29:1–30); and the so-called Confessions (11:18–23; 12:1–6; 15:10–21; 17:14–18; 18:18–23; 20:7–18).

Jeremiah's Confessions contain outpourings of emotion and anguish mixed with trust and gratitude. In the midst of faithfully delivering God's word in perilous circumstances, Jeremiah remained in deep and candid dialogue with the Lord. The Confessions show the depth of honesty and forthrightness that is appropriate in prayer when the situation requires it. Although personal and original, they include conventional forms of the lament prayers found in the book of Psalms.

Jeremiah's poetry reveals great variety: the ecstatic lyricism of the war songs (4:5b–9, 13–16, 19–22), the cosmic brooding of the imminent destruction (4:23–26), the intense subjectivity of the confessional laments (15:10–11, 15–20; 20:7–18), the unsparing and withering invectives with their accompanying threats (22:13–19), the pathetic effusion of intimate grief (13:15–17), the breathtaking judgment of an entire society by "an ode to the sword" (50:35–37), and the rhetorical diversity of prophecies against the foreign nations (46:3–12; 50:35–38; 51:1–58).

Jeremiah contains examples of the effective repetition of striking phrases or ideas, such as "sword, famine, and pestilence/plague" (14:12–16; 21:7, 9; 24:10; 27:8, 13; 29:17–18; 32:24, 36; 34:17; 38:2; 42:17, 22; 44:13) and the language of plucking up, tearing down, and destroying, or building and planting (or variants thereof), which expresses God's power to destroy or prosper a nation (1:10; 12:17; 18:7–9; 24:6; 31:28; 42:10). God communicates His earnest and continuous actions through His prophets by persistently (some translations have "rising early") speaking/sending/teaching (7:13, 25; 11:7; 25:3–4; 26:5; 29:19; 32:33; 35:14–15; 44:4; cf. 11:7; 25:3; 32:33; 35:14).

To lend force and coherence to his message, Jeremiah often uses alliteration and assonance, which are not reflected in the English translation (e.g., shaqed...shoqed, "almond...ready," 1:11–12; zarim wezeruah, "foreigners to winnow her," 51:2; pakhad wapakhath wapakh, "fear and pit and snare," 48:43; cf. Is. 24:17). Thematically important are his plays on the Hebrew word shub, "turn," "return," "backsliding" (Jer. 3:1–4:4; 8:4–17; 15:1–21; 34:8–22; cf. shub shebut, "restore the fortunes" or "bring back from captivity" in 29:14; 30:3, 18; 31:23; 32:44; 33:7, 11, 26). In almost every passage, we find the stylistic device of synecdoche, a partial expression referring to the whole, particularly for peoples, nations, cities, and lands (e.g., "Jerusalem" for Judah or Israel).

Like Ezekiel, Jeremiah uses powerful symbolism to highlight his messages (e.g., 13:1–11; 19:1–12; 24:1–10; 27:1–22; 43:8–13). Symbolism is also applied in the Lord's commands to perform certain actions (e.g., 16:1–4, 5–9; 32:6–15). Large portions of text are repeated throughout the book (e.g., 6:12–15 and 8:10–12; 10:12–16 and 51:15–19; 16:14–15 and 23:7–8; 23:5–6 and 33:15–16; 23:19–20 and 30:23–24; 30:10–11 and 46:27–28; 39:1–7 and 52:4–16). The purpose is pedagogical and communicative. Since books in ancient times were often read aloud to an audience due to limited reading skills and the scarcity of books, the repetition of key passages aimed at emphasis and it created bridges between different parts of the book. The technique of organizing sentences and larger units according to the principle of chiasmic structures is particularly frequent (e.g., 2:1–37; 8:18–9:3; 9:4–16; 19:3–9; 31:1–40; 32:1–44).

The great variety in literary forms and styles underscores the predominant feature in the book's composition, which is the mixture of systematic order and lack of order. Some portions of the book have marked beginnings and endings, while others are lengthy sequences with little or no transition. What seems clear is that while the first half of the book deals primarily with the disobedience of Judah (chaps. 2–25), the second part focuses more on the Babylonian threat and the judgment (chaps. 26–52) with a middle point of comfort in chapters 30–33. Unlike Ezekiel, the oracles in Jeremiah are not arranged in chronological order.

COMMENTARY

1:1–19

TITLE, PROLOGUE, AND PROPHETIC CALL

The first section of the book introduces us to the Prophet Jeremiah and the historical background of his ministry (1:1–3). His prophetic call (vv. 4–19) plays a significant role throughout the book—it is a source of strength when he suffers greatly or has to confront false prophets.

1:1–3*Title and Prologue

The title is similar to that of some other prophetic books; the book contains the words of a particular prophet whose ultimate source is the Lord (cf. Amos 1:1; Is. 1:1). The “words” designate the specific messages the prophet proclaimed. Jeremiah is identified historically as emerging from the priestly circles of Anathoth, a city in Benjamin that was situated three miles (5 km) northeast of Jerusalem. Jeremiah’s father, Hilkiah, may have been the Hilkiah who served Josiah (2 Kin. 22–23). Anathoth was the home of Abiathar, the priest who served David faithfully and carried the ark of the Lord before being removed from service by Solomon (1 Sam. 22:20–23; 23:6, 9–12; 2 Sam. 15:24–29, 34–36; 1 Kin. 2:26–27).

Jeremiah’s Hebrew name exists in two forms, yirmeyahu (e.g., Jer. 1:1; 29:27; 36:4) and yirmeyah (e.g., 27:1; 28:5; 29:1). The literal meaning is not clear, but part of his name refers to God (cf. 15:16). The name could mean “Yahweh has exalted or appointed.” God’s name was written yhwh (cf. Ex. 3:13–15) and appeared in theophoric proper names as yahu or yah, so it is no surprise to find both name forms in Jeremiah. Hebrew yirmeyahu became Ieremias in Greek (the LXX, ca. 250–200 B.C.) and Latin (Vg., ca. A.D. 400). The English form Jeremiah is attested from the fourteenth century A.D. The purpose of Jeremiah 1:1–3 is obviously not to provide an exhaustive list of kings and dates (two minor kings are missing) but to indicate that Jeremiah prophesied under several kings until the Babylonian disaster (ca. 627–586 B.C.).

1:4–19*Prophetic Call

This passage cements Jeremiah’s prophetic authority as established by God’s commission, the details of which anticipate the content of the book as a whole. Jeremiah was called to be a prophet to the nations (v. 5), but his special task was to warn Judah and Jerusalem of the impending judgment (vv. 13–16).

1:4–10. A Prophet to the Nations. The call is a dialogue in which God declared that He was appointing Jeremiah as a prophet to the nations (vv. 5, 10). Jeremiah’s immediate reply was that he was too young and unable to speak, which is a sign of humility (v. 6). God rejected the objection by repeating His decision and proceeded to assure Jeremiah of His presence and deliverance (vv. 7–8). He then touched Jeremiah’s mouth, which was a sign of placing His words in the prophet’s mouth. He also explained that Jeremiah’s task as prophet “over” the nations would be to announce their destruction or rise to prosperity (vv. 9–10). The motif of God’s words in Jeremiah’s mouth is found elsewhere in the book (5:14; 15:19; 36:18; cf. Ezra 1:1; 2 Chr. 36:12, 21–22).

The references to God knowing, sanctifying (or setting apart), and designating Jeremiah as a prophet to the nations in Jeremiah 1:5 seem influenced by formal calls to an office (cf. 49:19; 50:44). However, the technical or sacramental sense of the English term “ordain” that is found in some translations is not conveyed by the Hebrew verb. The verb natan used here simply means “give,” “put,” or “make.” Jeremiah 1:4–19 describes, however, the formal commissioning of a royal priest-prophet. First, the technical Hebrew term peqad—“appoint,” “set,” or “commission”—is used in v. 10 (cf. 49:19; 50:44; 51:27). Secondly, the reference in 1:5 to God’s sanctifying (qadash) alludes to the priestly appointment (Ex. 28:3, 41). Thirdly, Jeremiah’s commissioning included the appointment (Jer. 1:5), charge/sending (vv. 6–7), assurance (v. 8), authorization to speak God’s word (v. 9), acknowledgment and commission (vv. 10, 13–16), charge and exhortation (vv. 17–18), and renewed assurance (v. 19).

As the Sovereign Lord of the nations, God consecrated Jeremiah as His royal servant and messenger who would stand in His sod—a Hebrew word meaning “counsel” or “council” (cf. 23:21–22). God’s commission (1:10) included both judgment and salvation. This dual aspect of Jeremiah’s ministry is expressed in the visions of the almond branch (vv. 11–12) and the boiling pot (vv. 13–16). The duality of judgment and salvation is particularly applied to God’s chosen people Israel (e.g., 2:2–3, 21; cf. Deut. 7:6). The judgment messages call the unfaithful to repentance, while the messages of salvation bring comfort and hope to the faithful in exile.

1:11–19. Commission and Assurance. The dialogue between God and Jeremiah continues with two contrasting visions. The almond branch is associated with what God would “build and plant,” and the boiling pot with what He would pluck up, tear down, destroy, and overthrow (cf. v. 10). The former receives scant explanation, while the judgment on Judah and Jerusalem is detailed. The vision of the almond branch is described in terse, almost mystifying words. God’s words in the Hebrew read literally, “I am watching my word, to carry it out” (v. 12). The striking wordplay between the branch of “almond” (shaqed) and God’s “watching” (shoqed) means that God was eager and ready to accomplish His word. The almond branch is associated with “planting” (cf. v. 10), and Jeremiah often describes the harmonious relationship between God and His people as an act of “planting” (18:9–10; 24:6; 31:27–28; 32:41; 42:10; cf. 2:21; 12:10). The term “watch” (shaqad) is a key word in Jeremiah. In 31:27–28, God says that as He had “watched” over His people to pluck up, tear down, destroy, and overthrow, so would He “watch over them to build and to plant.” Here, the theme of “watching and planting” leads directly into the prophecy about God’s new covenant with His people (vv. 29–34). Thus, while the literal sense of God’s explanation of the almond branch is “I am watching my word, to carry it out,” the context (cf. vv. 4–19) allows us to understand it as an allusion to God’s promissory word: as watching overseer and Lord of history, He carries out His word, which means destroying the old (vv. 13–16)—the disobedient people and the broken covenant—and planting something new (vv. 11–12)—the new covenant with His remnant people (cf. 31:27–34).

Jeremiah’s office as a prophet to the nations (1:5, 10) is described with specific regard to Judah and Jerusalem (v. 18). Here, Jeremiah is contrasted with the land, the kings, the princes, the priests, and the people of the land: he was to be a stronghold against the apostate Judah and Jerusalem (cf. 15:20). It is predicted that they would fight against him, but they would not prevail. God’s presence would be with him to deliver him (1:19; cf. 37:11—38:28).

2:1—25:38

JUDGMENT AND CALL FOR CONVERSION TO JUDAH AND JERUSALEM

This first half of the book of Jeremiah contains seventeen sections concerning Judah and Jerusalem. It particularly addresses the people’s faithlessness to the covenant with the Lord, His judgment against them, and His repeated calls for repentance.

2:1–37

God’s Case against Israel

Considering its content, internal literary features, and the number and gender of the forms of address, this section is formally structured as two chiasms. Both call attention to God’s legal case against Israel as wife (marriage) and as people (covenant):

A Wife: Israel’s First Love Lost: A Disaster (vv. 1–3)

B People: God’s Lawsuit against Israel (vv. 4–13)

A’ Wife: Admonition of Israel: Foreign Oppression (vv. 14–19)

A Wife: Israel Goes After Alien Gods (vv. 20–28)

B People: God Defends His Case against Israel (vv. 29–32)

A’ Wife: Israel’s Innocence Contradicted by Evidence (vv. 33–37)

The feminine singular form addresses Jerusalem (v. 1) as a “woman” or “daughter” and Israel as God’s “wife” (the metaphor of marriage dominates this passage). The masculine plural form addresses “the house of Jacob”/“the house of Israel” (v. 4). As a central city and sanctuary, Jerusalem represents the people, and the people represent Jerusalem’s inhabitants and worshipers in her sanctuary.

2:1–3. Israel’s First Love Lost: A Disaster. Jeremiah’s account of the formal address to Jerusalem (v. 1) includes the house of Jacob and all the families of the house of Israel (v. 4). The unit consists of three parts. First, the Lord said that He remembered Israel, whereas Israel had “forgotten” the Lord (v. 32). When the Lord “remembers” His people, it is generally associated with His saving actions and is expressed, for example, in prayers for God’s saving intervention (Ex. 32:13; Ps. 9:12; Jer. 15:15). However, in v. 2, the Lord’s positive “remembrance” of Israel concerns only the distant past, and any positive future expectations it might raise are crushed by the abrupt indictment and judgment in v. 3.

Second, the Lord remembered His people’s initial relationship with Him, their khesed (“kindness,” “devotion,” “faithfulness”), their love, and their willingness to follow Him. In response, He honored them by regarding them as holy to Him and the firstfruits of His tebo’ah—“revenue” or “increase”; in this context, it is sometimes rendered as “harvest” (i.e., Israel specifically belonged to Him; v. 3). These references concern Israel’s distant past, the Exodus, Sinai, and God’s protection in the wilderness. The Lord was loved in Israel’s youth, at the time of their betrothal (Sinai), in the wilderness, and in a land not sown (v. 2). This theme is expanded in more detail in vv. 5–7b.

Third, the Lord's positive remembrance of Israel is abruptly contrasted in the text by the stirring and shocking judgment announced against those who would attack them (v. 3). The reasons for such an attack are explained in vv. 4–37. The reference to "following" or "going after" describes Israel's faithfulness to God (v. 2). Following or going after God (as a husband) or gods (as lovers) binds vv. 2–37 together (vv. 2, 5, 8, 23, 25). This term is associated with an act of loyalty that may still be seen in the Near East, where the wife literally walks behind her husband in recognition of his role as her "master" (ba'al).

The end of v. 3 implies that anyone mistreating Israel would be held guilty before God. The literal Hebrew text reads, "All that eat it will be guilty," with "it" referring to the "firstfruits," symbolizing Israel (v. 3b). The metaphor derives from the custom of setting aside the firstfruits only for the Lord (Lev. 23:9–14). If they were put to common use, the firstfruits were "profaned." Thus, if God's firstfruits (Israel) were "eaten" like common food (i.e., treated like any other nation), God would hold the adversary accountable because the holiness of Israel would be profaned. This theme is resumed and expanded in vv. 4–37.

Israel's status as "holy" and as God's "firstfruits" among the nations was conditioned by their faithfulness to the covenant (v. 3c). If they violated the covenant stipulations, God's holy temple in Jerusalem and their special role as His servants among the nations would both come to an end. The point of the unit is that God's intimate and beautiful memory of Israel's love and faithfulness (vv. 2–3b) would be overshadowed by the breaking of the covenant.

2:4–13. God's Lawsuit against Israel. Jeremiah continues with the judgment announced as a lawsuit against Israel, with indictment (vv. 5–8) and charges (vv. 9–13), and with an assertion that Israel had abandoned their God. This indictment frames the unit as a whole (vv. 5, 13) and develops the charge against Israel mentioned in Jeremiah's call (1:16). It also explains why the harmonious betrothal of Israel and the Lord had turned into judgment.

God initiated the procedure by asking what fault or injustice Israel's ancestors had found with God (2:5a). The answer was "None." Yet unfortunately, Israel had forgotten to follow Yahweh and had turned to other gods (vv. 5b–8). These ideas are structured in a chiastic form:

- A Follow (halak akhar) idols (v. 5b)
- B Where is the Lord? (v. 6)
- B' Where is the Lord? (v. 8a)
- A Walk after (halak akhare) things that do not profit (v. 8b)

The expression "walk after" was used positively to refer to the young bride Israel who faithfully followed God (v. 2). In vv. 5–8, it is applied to Israel's marital infidelity. Israel had forgotten God's faithfulness, how He had delivered them out of Egypt and led them through the wilderness (v. 6), but God remembered Israel's initial fidelity (v. 2). They had defiled the land the Lord had given them (vv. 7–8), the land made holy by His presence (v. 3a–b). All the people had defiled the land by following idols. Jeremiah holds everyone responsible for the demise of the nation: priests, those who handle the law, rulers, and prophets (v. 8).

The lawsuit, based on the indictment (vv. 5–8), is introduced by "therefore" (lakhen; v. 9). The formal charges follow in vv. 9–13. The substance of the lawsuit (vv. 10–11) is that Israel had changed its God. The Lord appealed to common sense: no nation changes its gods (which are not gods), but this is what Israel had done to the Sovereign Lord (v. 11). He summoned the heavens as legal witnesses (v. 12) and restated Israel's crimes (v. 13). Verses 6–7 clearly imply that when the story of the land as a divine gift was lost (i.e., when Israel failed to remember Yahweh), the loss of the land soon followed.

2:14–19. Admonition of Israel: Foreign Oppression. These verses discuss the problem of the oppression of Israel by foreign powers. First, God asks why Israel is under foreign oppression (v. 14). The initial questions regarding whether Israel was a slave, or born a slave, may be answered with yes or no. In vv. 14–19, the answer is yes, for Israel had, in reality, become a servant/slave to the foreign nations. Looking at vv. 2–37 as a whole, however, the answer is no, for Israel was meant to be a much-loved nation holy to the Lord and the firstfruits of His revenue/harvest (vv. 2–3). Some translations follow the LXX in v. 20 and describe Israel as breaking off their yoke and bonds—which could be taken to refer to their rebellion and refusal to serve God, which is described in the rest of the verse. The MT, however, states that it is God ("I") who broke their yoke and bonds, which would probably refer to the deliverance from Egypt. Thus, the answer to the final question of why Israel was plundered is implied in the first two questions: oppression and slavery were not God's plan for Israel, but they resulted from Israel's choices.

Second, we find the description of the oppression (vv. 15–16). Assyria's power in its destruction of the lands of Israel (722 B.C.) and Judah (701 B.C.) is compared to that of lions roaring at their prey. (v. 15). Egypt is referred to as the people of Noph (Memphis) and Tahpanhes. The last part of the verse uses the verb ra'ah, which usually means "to feed" or "to graze," but is often interpreted as referring here to either breaking or shaving Israel's head (v. 16).

Third, the foreign oppression was Israel's own fault (vv. 17–19). The answer to the initial questions in v. 14 is confirmed: Israel had brought their oppression upon themselves by forsaking their God. Israel's faith in Assyria and Egypt is referred to as drinking from the waters of these superpowers (v. 18). Israel had forsaken the Lord, the spring and fountain of living waters, and instead had dug broken cisterns that could not hold water (v. 13). For forsaking their Lord, Israel would be disciplined and rebuked. The concluding messenger formula uses the name yahweh tseba'ot (v. 19)—translated variously as "the Lord of Hosts," "Lord of Armies," or "the Lord Almighty." This is the first use of the term in the book of Jeremiah, where it is a frequent name for Israel's God. It is commonly associated with the concept of God as King of the world.

2:20–28. Israel Goes After Alien Gods. In an exchange between Israel's self-indictments (vv. 20, 23, 25, 27) and God's responses, the pursuit of fertility religion is denounced as a shameful criminal offense. The intention of each of these arguments is to move Israel to repentance and to return to God, the central theme of 3:1–4:4.

The first self-indictment is Israel's response to God delivering them from Egypt. There is a manuscript difference in v. 20: Some Hebrew manuscripts have lo'e'ebod—"I will not serve," while others have lo'e'ebor—"I will not transgress." If the former is correct, Israel's refusal to "serve" God is seen in their widespread apostasy to fertility cults (v. 20c). The "high hill" was a country shrine for the Canaanite deity Baal. Its altitude pointed to Baal's heavenly home from which rains fell to water the land. Shrines were located under flourishing trees (i.e., as symbols of fertility). The religious practices in these shrines were essentially sexual. Being "married" to the Lord, Israel became a prostitute when she went after other gods.

Another indictment (v. 21) is that God planted His people as a special vine and a reliable seed (cf. Ps. 80:8–11), and consequently, there was no reason for them to turn into a degenerate, wild vine. They could not claim innocence because their crimes were obvious (Jer. 2:22–25). Vivid and dynamic symbols are used: the swift dromedary (v. 23) illustrates unreliability and aimless movement; the wild donkey (v. 24) illustrates lust-debased passion and seeking a partner with whom to fulfill urgent and animal passions. Similarly, Israel had lost all sense of direction and was driven by selfish lusts.

Yahweh Tseba'ot

The solemn title yahweh tseba'ot was associated with the ark of the covenant in the Jerusalem temple. Jeremiah's close connection with the temple and his frequent judgment speeches in and about it would make this well-known designation of God appealing to his audience.

1. Use in the Old Testament. Of the total occurrences of the term in the OT (ca. 285), 247 are found in the prophetic books. Eighty-two of these are found in Jeremiah, thus placing the book at the top of the list of occurrences. A number of passages underscore that this is God's name (31:35; 35:18–19; 50:34; 51:19, 57), which is associated with His roles as "the God of Israel" (35:18–19; 50:18; 51:33) and Judah (v. 5) as well as the King of the nations (46:18; 51:57).

2. Meaning of the Name. The name of God (Heb. Yahweh) is translated "the LORD" in the LXX and in most Bible translations. The Hebrew epithet tseba'ot derives from tsaba' ("host," "army"), but its meaning is unclear. Various suggestions have been made, but the most attractive possibility is that it refers to angels or divine messengers (Gen. 1:26; 32:1–2; Josh. 5:14; 1 Kin. 22:19;

Ps. 82; Is. 6). The “hosts” or “armies” of servants surrounding the throne of God would then illustrate the royal power of God (Jer. 8:19; 10:10; 46:18; 48:15; 51:57); hence, some translations render the term as “the Lord Almighty.”

3. Cultic Significance. The general function of the epithet Yahweh tseba’ot is rooted in its cultic significance. It was used in Shiloh (1 Sam. 1:3, 11) and was closely connected with the ark in the sanctuary (1 Sam. 6:4). The ark was a wooden box overlaid with gold, surmounted by the golden “mercy seat” or “atonement cover” with two golden cherubim on either end (Ex. 25:17–22). It was a symbol of God’s throne, but since He is not visible, He is said to be enthroned between the cherubim. The two cherubim on the ark probably symbolized the host of God’s servants (messengers, armies) forming His heavenly council. The epithet is also associated with the covenant because the ark contained the two stone tablets that Moses placed there (1 Kin. 8:9; cf. Ex. 25:16, 21). From Shiloh, the ark was eventually moved to the house of Abinadab, then to the city of David, and finally to the temple in Jerusalem (1 Sam. 7:1; 2 Sam. 6:1–15; 1 Kin. 8:1–13).

The people’s attitude turned into resignation and continued rebellion (v. 25). The text presents the shameful idolatry of the nation (cf. v. 8) as ridiculed by the absence of life in the images of the gods (v. 26). What a shame to refer to a tree as father and a stone as mother while turning their backs on their Lord (v. 27; cf. Is. 44:9–20)! In the times of trouble awaiting Judah, the nation would be destroyed due to its unfaithfulness and the powerlessness of its false gods to save (v. 28).

2:29–32. God Defends His Case against Israel.

After God declared His intention to bring an accusation (rib, “conduct a lawsuit”) against Israel (v. 9), He asked why Israel was bringing an accusation (rib) against Him (v. 29). The foreign oppression generated accusations against God for not remaining faithful to the covenant, but such claims are refuted. All Israel had transgressed against the Lord (vv. 28–29). God had chastened Israel in vain. They accepted no correction and killed His prophets (v. 30). Jeremiah appealed to them not only to hear the word but also to see its reality and fulfillment (v. 31a).

God denied that He had been a desert or darkness to Israel (v. 31), for in reality, He had led Israel through these dangers (v. 6). The real issue was why the people declared their unwillingness to return to God and why they proclaimed “radnu,” which could mean “We are lords,” “We are free to roam,” or as the LXX reads, “We will not be ruled over.” The main point is clear—the people were claiming their independence from God. Israel was oppressed because they had forsaken God as their Lord and had made themselves lords by worshiping idols made by their own hands.

A virgin cannot forget her ornaments, nor a bride her attire (v. 32a). A husband’s provision of ornaments and attire for his wife at their wedding ceremony represented the honor and new status of the woman. Since God had bestowed His honor upon Israel (vv. 2–3, 6–7), she should have been devoted to Him, yet she had forgotten Him (v. 32b).

2:33–37. Israel’s Innocence Contradicted by Evidence.

The rebuttal of Israel’s claim to innocence in vv. 20–28 returns in vv. 33–37 with verbal links in the Hebrew (which are not clear in all English versions): (a) derek—“way,” “manner” (vv. 23 [2x], 33 [2x], 36); (b) ’akhabah—“love” (vv. 25, 33); (c) matsa’—“find” (vv. 24, 26 [some translations have “caught” or “discovered” here], 34 [x2—some translations have “catch” in the latter part of the verse]); and (d) bosh—“shame” (vv. 26, 36 [x2—some translations have “disappointed”]). Israel’s claim to innocence was framed by judgment (vv. 33–37). Thus, 2:1–37 begins and ends with the theme of “love” (the love of betrothal versus the “love” of prostitution, vv. 2, 33) and the execution of judgment (vv. 3c–d, 36b–37).

Claiming innocence, Israel believed that God was not angry with them (v. 35a). However, evidence reveals that the Israelites sought love by prostitution (v. 33) and that they had oppressed the innocent, as the blood on their skirts indicated (v. 34). God’s covenant protected the poor and the innocent, while the fertility cults turned “love” into sexual lust. In the face of the evidence, God would plead His case with unfaithful Israel (v. 35c–d). According to some interpretations of the Hebrew, God was reproaching His people for “taking so lightly”

(Heb. zalaʾ) the need to change their ways (v. 36a). Others render the verse according to the verb 'azal (“go about,” “go away”), which results in a question regarding why Israel was going around changing their ways.

The section concludes with judgment (vv. 36b–37). Israel would be ashamed of (or disappointed in) Egypt just as much as they were of Assyria. The reference to hands placed on the head refers to captivity and death (Egyptian reliefs depicting warfare show prisoners of war or those about to be killed with arms upheld in a position of self-protection). Israel would not prosper with the support of these allies because God had rejected these nations (cf. 46:1—51:58). No ally could accomplish anything without permission from the Lord of the nations (cf. 1:10).

3:1—4:4

The Return of Unfaithful Israel

Following the indictments against God’s people (2:1–37), a passionate plea for repentance and return to the Lord appears next, with a promise of restoration (3:1—4:4). It is only thereafter that judgment is declared (4:5—6:30).

3:1–5. Return to Me, Unfaithful Wife. The wife’s return to her husband after belonging to another man would have raised a legal issue. The law stipulated that a divorced wife who had married another man could not return to her first husband (Deut. 24:1–4). A transgression of this law was a serious sin that polluted or defiled the land that had been made holy by God’s presence. Jeremiah quotes this law in condensed form and as a popular custom, but he shifts the emphasis. The law prohibited the husband from “taking her back” as his wife, but the question in Jeremiah 3:1 is whether the husband could lawfully return to his wife whom he had divorced. The question is whether God’s acceptance of Israel was proper or not. Though Israel was the estranged wife, God was asking her to return because of His loving forgiveness. Although Israel had been unfaithful, with many lovers (cf. 2:2–37), God still (3:1) wanted her back. This powerful expression of God’s grace should have had a strong persuasive impact on Jeremiah’s audience. The yearning of God for His people makes Him risk even the apparent dishonor of receiving His unfaithful wife back. Thus, Jeremiah echoes Hosea regarding the depth of God’s love for Israel and anticipates the gospel in the NT where God’s grace, not the law, is the way of salvation. The implied message is that God assumes responsibility for our transgression of the law on the basis of His compassion. He could offer forgiveness to the people as their rejected Husband—something that many human husbands would not do.

The Lord made all Israel aware of their infidelity. His wife’s unfaithfulness and wickedness had defiled the land, resulting in a sustained drought and shortage of food (vv. 2–3, 5b). She had acted like a harlot—without shame (3:3b). She ignored the outcome of her disobedience (i.e., the drought), which should have convinced her of God’s power. Baal supposedly brought rain and fruitfulness, but God proved His sovereignty by withholding the rain (v. 3).

The unit ends with a summary reproach against the people for their evil words and deeds (v. 5b). Verses 2–3 describe what they had done and vv. 4–5a what they had said. Some translations suggest (v. 4) that God directs another plea for repentance to His people. However, if v. 5a continues the people’s speech in v. 4, then that verse can be understood as God’s way of ironically reproaching them for their treacherous way of speaking (i.e., for feigning faithfulness to the Lord while, in reality, being unfaithful). The Hebrew word ʾallup has been translated as “guide” or “friend” in v. 4. It may also be translated “Did not you then call Me: ‘My Father, you are the husband of my youth?’” (cf. 2:2). The cry “My Father” characterizes the language of worship, whether of idols (2:27) or of the Lord (3:19b). Thus, God’s quotation of the people’s words in vv. 4–5a is a reproach for their syncretistic hypocrisy. They wanted both the old covenant promises and the new attractions of fertility worship. By saying one thing (vv. 4–5a) and doing another (vv. 2–3), they were breaking the covenant but continuing to claim the blessing of harmony with God.

3:6–11. Israel’s and Judah’s Past Refusals to Return. This prose unit may be dated between Jeremiah’s call (627 B.C.) and the death of Josiah (609 B.C.). It develops the theme of 3:1–5 through the use of repeated terms: (a) “backsliding/faithlessness,” “return,” “turn” (shub; vv. 6, 7, 8, 10, 11; cf. v. 1); (b) zanah—variously rendered in translations as “to act immorally,” “act like a prostitute,” or “commit adultery” (vv. 6, 9; cf. vv. 1, 2, 3); (c) “divorce” (shalakh; v. 8; cf. v. 1); and (d) “defile” (khanep; v. 9; cf. vv. 1–2).

This unit starts with an account of the evil apostasy of Israel (the Hebrew word meshubah used to describe it derives from shub, “turn,” “return,” “repent”). The Northern Kingdom of Israel had utterly apostatized and defiled the land (vv. 6, 9), and its destruction by Assyria in 722 B.C. was the punishment. Although God, through the prophets, invited them to return to Him, Israel refused to comply (v. 7). This ended God's covenant with the kingdom of Israel (v. 8). God then reproaches Israel's sister, the "treacherous" or "faithless" Judah (vv. 7–11). Judah failed to learn lessons from the experience of Israel and committed the same mistakes (vv. 8, 10). Therefore, Judah had less of an excuse than Israel (v. 11).

3:12–18. Israel and Judah Summoned to Return. God first turned to the Northern Kingdom (Israel) because it was "more righteous" than the Southern Kingdom (Judah), who did not learn from Israel's experience (v. 11). He commanded Jeremiah to proclaim the merciful message to Israel to return (vv. 12–13). The territory of the Northern Kingdom came under the control of Judah during the days of Josiah (2 Kin. 23:15–20), following the decline of Assyria. If 3:1–4:4 originated during Jeremiah's early ministry and in connection with Josiah's reform (see Jeremiah: Introduction), an invitation to return to the Lord would therefore have included the northerners. They were invited to respond to Josiah's call to return to the Lord.

The distinction between Israel and Judah, which was vital in vv. 6–13, is now abolished. God took a more personal and intimate approach in the invitation to return by addressing them as faithless or backsliding children (vv. 14, 22), which implied that He was their Father and God (cf. v. 19). God's call to Israel was based on the fact that He was married to them (v. 14). With the covenant in place, based on His grace and the people's repentance, God promised hope for His people. The appeal in vv. 14–18 contains a plan for the restoration of God's people. They would return to worship God in Zion; the reference to "one from a city/town" may signify the city elder, and "two from a family/clan" might refer to a married couple (v. 14). Their shepherds (kings and elders) would feed them with knowledge and understanding (v. 15), and the families were to multiply and increase (v. 16a). The ark of the covenant of the Lord would no longer be present (according to an ancient tradition, it was secreted away before the final fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C.). Instead, God Himself was to be present. Jerusalem would be called the Throne of the Lord, and the name of the Lord was to be attached to it (vv. 16b–17a; cf. Rev. 21:22–23). God's sovereignty would be acknowledged by all nations (cf. Rev. 21:24–26). They would gather in Jerusalem and follow His law (Jer. 3:17; cf. 4:2; Is. 2:2–4; Mic. 4:1–4). Peace and reconciliation would prevail, and Judah and Israel would reunite in the promised land (Jer. 3:18).

3:19–4:4. Implications of a Return. This unit interacts with 3:1–18 through key terms such as "children" (some translations have "people"; vv. 19, 21, 22; cf. v. 14), "heritage," "inheritance" (v. 19; cf. v. 18), "desolate [or barren] heights" (v. 21; cf. v. 2), "reproach," "shame" (v. 25; cf. v. 3), "obey"/"hear" (v. 25; cf. v. 13), and variant forms of "turn" (Heb. shub) throughout the entire section. The theme of the section is "turning to the Lord," and it is developed from four different angles: (a) turning to the Lord is the foundation of the covenant (v. 19); (b) Israel's adultery is healed by turning to the Lord (vv. 20–22b); (c) Israel's prayer of penitence is the path toward turning to the Lord (vv. 22b–25); (d) Israel's failure was their "turning" (shub) away from God and toward the fertility gods, but their healing also comes from their "turning" (shub) toward God. This is about the direction our lives are heading, and there are only two options: toward or away from the Lord. The consequence of returning to the Lord is that He will fulfill His promise to Abraham (4:2; cf. Gen. 12:1–3) when all the nations will pronounce blessings by God and will glory or "boast" in Him.

This unit (Jer. 4:3–4) concludes the call to repentance and return found in 3:1–4:4 and introduces a lengthy section on judgment (4:5–6:30). Two metaphors are used to illustrate the need for changing hard hearts: sowing in good, broken soil (cf. Hos. 10:12; Matt. 13:1–23) and the circumcision of the heart. Failure to do this inevitably results in judgment. God's holiness and rejection of evil are described through the symbol of an anger that would burn with such intensity that no one could quench it (see "The Wrath of God," p. 918).

4:5–6:30

The Divine Judgment

God's case against unfaithful Judah (2:1–37) is followed by repeated calls for repentance and returning to Him (3:1–4:4). Subsequently, the text develops the theme of judgment (4:5–6:30): God's reaction to the covenant violations of His people in Judah (see Jeremiah: Introduction).

4:5–10. Destruction from the North. In this unit, the language of warfare is used to warn Judah and Jerusalem about the importance of seeking shelter (vv. 5–6a). The Lord's invasion from the north would cause massive destruction: the land would become abandoned, and the cities uninhabited (vv. 6b–7). The people would lament and wail because of the fierce anger of the Lord (v. 8; cf. v. 4). The identity of the northern invader is unclear. Both Assyrian and Babylonian armies were seen as coming from the north. The metaphor of a lion (v. 7) would fit Babylon since this symbol was prominent in Nebuchadnezzar's palace. The point of the unit is that the Lord would send the invader because of the broken covenant.

The priests and the prophets had falsely promised peace to Judah (cf. 6:14; 8:11). Yet Jeremiah states that it was God who had deceived the people by promising peace (v. 10). This may be explained in various ways: (a) Jeremiah may have been interceding for the people, expressing before the Lord what they believed (even he had questions about God's judgment; cf. 12:1); (b) he may have held God responsible for allowing the deceptive prophecies to be given; or (c) he may have mocked the talk of "peace," when, in reality, what was coming was destruction by the "sword." The two best possibilities are (a) and (b); Jeremiah's point, however, is the tension he experiences between loyally delivering God's words of judgment and praying that it might be averted. In this regard, Jeremiah's attitude resembles that of Moses (cf. Ex. 32).

4:11–31. Winds of War, Woe, and Disaster.

This unit opens using images of wind and winnowing to describe the harsh judgment of the invaders (vv. 11–12). The swiftness of the attackers, expressed through images of clouds, a whirlwind, and eagles, elicits a cry of woe from the people of Judah (v. 13). In response, Jeremiah announced that to be saved, Jerusalem would have to cleanse their hearts from evil (v. 14). The Lord attributed the judgment to the city herself (vv. 17b–18). This is a poignant example of Jeremiah's powerful prophetic poetry. In rapid succession, he presents multiple distinct images, hoping to persuade Judah to return to the Lord and avoid the threat of judgment. Verses 19–32 could be grouped into three subunits.

1. Destruction and Anguish—God's Lamentation over His People (vv. 19–22). The sound of the trumpet announced the alarm of war, followed by deep anguish. In the prophecy, the destruction moves closer, beginning with the whole land, then the tents, and finally the sheltering curtains (v. 20). Death is approaching in a dramatic way, and its anticipation causes fear and anxiety—hopelessness. This personal anguish is contrasted with God's grief over His people. He laments their foolishness, their lack of understanding and knowledge of Him, their astuteness in regard to evil, and their ignorance regarding how to do good (v. 22). Knowing God and acting in harmony with God's values is a central theme in Jeremiah (see Jeremiah: Introduction).

2. Judgment as De-creation (vv. 23–28). The effects of the prophesied invasion were clearly seen by the prophet (the phrase "I beheld" or "I looked" is repeated four times). In the prophecy, judgment reinstates an absence of order: the earth was formless and void, or empty; the heavens had no light (v. 23); the mountains quaked, and all the hills moved to and fro (v. 24); there were no people (Heb. 'adam); all the birds of the heavens had fled (v. 25); the fruitful land was deserted, and all its cities were destroyed (v. 26). A surprising statement is suddenly made: God promised that the destruction would not be complete (v. 27). This is a marked deviation from the relentless onslaught of judgment. Although the Lord announced devastation, He yearned for His people. This divine yearning was the source of hope for Judah. God had plans to create a new community through whom His mission in the world would be achieved.

3. Desolation, Contempt, and Wailing (vv. 29–31). The invaders would desolate all the cities of Judah (v. 29). After the plundering, the prostitute wife Israel/Zion would no longer be attractive, and her lovers would not only despise her but would also seek her life; she was to be like a woman wailing in labor or in fear of murderers (v. 31).

5:1–19. Indictment and Pardon. God challenged the prophet to find one person in Jerusalem executing mishpat—"judgment" or "justice," and seeking the truth. He would pardon the city for the sake of one person (v. 1). In the case of Sodom (Gen. 18:22–32), the condition for saving the city was to find ten righteous people. God's stated condition here to Jerusalem was less than what He required of Sodom, underscoring Jerusalem's utter depravity (cf. Jer. 23:14). Jeremiah was forewarned that even if someone swears to tell the truth, he probably swears falsely (5:2). As Jeremiah went searching, he realized that neither the poor (vv. 3–4) nor the powerful (v. 5)—the entire city—met the criteria of righteousness. This confirmed their refusal to return to the Lord.

The word “therefore” introduces the judgment (v. 6). It is described by metaphors of ferocious beasts (lion, wolf, and leopard) that would strike down, devastate, and lie in wait for the cities of Judah to tear into pieces everyone trying to escape. This judgment was a response to the increased transgressions and backslidings of the people. Verses 1–6 intensify the description of both the nation’s many crimes and the cruelty of the judgment. In the midst of this, however, God spoke, still ready to pardon the repentant (v. 1). God’s word in vv. 7–9 is the core of the dialogue. He asked how He could forgive the people for what they had done. The implied answer here is the impossibility of pardon. After a detailed and vivid outline of the people’s violation of the covenant, God concluded by asking whether He should not punish and take vengeance upon His people (v. 9; cf. v. 29). Thus, while judgment was inevitable, God desperately looked for a way to pardon His people. But they gave Him no valid option.

The Lord’s indictment of His people continues (vv. 11–13, 19), His judgment predicted in realistic and vivid terms (vv. 14–17). However, the judgment is framed by God’s firm decision that He would not completely destroy Judah and Jerusalem (vv. 10, 18; cf. 4:10). Speaking of His people as a vine (cf. 2:21–22), He placed parameters on the execution of His judgment (5:10). Here, the judgment takes on the nature of pruning and removing what is alien, with the vine left to grow new branches. The grounds for this caveat to the judgment is God’s love for His people and His never-ending hope that a faithful remnant would return to Him. Through them, God’s plan for Israel’s new future would be carried out (cf. 29:10–14; 31:1–33:26).

The Lord announced that the result of Israel’s unfaithfulness would not be extermination but exile. This is underlined by connecting unfaithfulness with the coming exile (5:19b). Judah’s exile would be caused by her having served other gods—a covenant term that includes loyalty, worship, moral behavior, and lifestyle—and by her forsaking the Lord—another reference to the covenant that is related to the metaphor of marriage (cf. 2:2–3). Going after alien lovers (cf. 3:1) led to an alien marriage, and this choice had brought Israel into an alien land without God’s promise and provision. The hope of liberation from exile lay in returning to God, the One who would provide a future for Israel.

According to 4:10, the people were deceived not only by false prophets who promised them peace but also by the Lord, who confirmed their willingness to believe the lie. This theme is resumed in vv. 12–13. Deceived by false prophets (v. 13), all Israel concluded that God would not be the agent of the judgment and that no evil would come upon them (vv. 11–12). This mockery of the Lord completely denied His authority and right to judge His people, but it freed God from the allegation that He had deceived them.

5:20–31. The Foolish Heart of God’s People.

This unit develops various aspects of the people’s failure, providing reasons for the inevitable judgment. The admonition to “hear” announces an instruction that Israel was to accept. But they were “without understanding” or “senseless” (lit. “without heart” or “mindless”; the Hebrew word leb includes intellectual as well as emotional connotations). Seeing and hearing leads to “a heart of wisdom” (e.g., Ps. 90:12; Prov. 8:5; 16:23; 21:11), while having eyes/ears but neither seeing nor hearing indicates foolishness (Jer. 5:21; cf. Prov. 16:22–23; Is. 6:9–10). God’s call to Israel was to “hear” and “love their God with all their heart” (Deut. 6:4–5). The people’s recalcitrant and rebellious hearts (Jer. 5:23) were challenged through a hymn that praises the power and greatness of the Creator (v. 22), using motifs found also in Isaiah (40:12–17; 44:21–28) and Job (5:8–15; 9:5–10). God rules over His creation (cf. Gen. 1:1–2, 9–10). The people foolishly did not fear the Lord, which they should have done since He, and no one else, gave them life. Only He, not the fertility gods whom the people were serving, was able to provide both rain and harvest (Jer. 5:24).

When the heart is empty of the word of God, His life-giving blessings are turned away (v. 25), there is a ruthless lack of love and care for one’s neighbor (vv. 26–27), and people hoard riches while failing to show compassion to the poor and needy (vv. 27–28). Thus, Jeremiah connects the commandment to love God with all of one’s heart (Deut. 6:4–5) with the commandment to love one’s neighbor as oneself (Lev. 19:18; cf. Matt. 22:34–40). Jesus endorsed Jeremiah’s teaching that the fear of God (Jer. 5:22, 24) unlocks divine truth and fullness of life (cf. Matt. 22:37–40). Such reverential fear is part of the eternal gospel proclaimed by the first angel to all peoples on earth (Rev. 14:6–7). The passage concludes with a question to Israel: “What will you do in the end?” (v. 31). The “end” (akharith) includes the temporal sense of “future” as well as the logical sense of “outcome” (cf. Deut. 32:20; Jer. 17:11). But this term may also signify “posterity” or “remnant” (Num. 24:20; Ps. 109:13; Ezek. 23:25; Dan. 11:4).

Israel needed to hear the word of the Lord, return to Him, and be saved; if they would not listen, the outcome would be disaster (cf. Jer. 5:21).

6:1–8. Saving a Remnant. The people (lit. “children”) of Benjamin were urged to flee from Jerusalem (v. 1). Benjamin represents all Israel. Since Tekoa and Beth Hacerem were located south and west of Jerusalem, and Benjamin was to the north, the warning was to be sounded around the city (v. 3). In warfare, provision could be made for some people in a city under attack to be spared from the killing and destruction (cf. Josh. 6:22–25), which would make it possible for a small remnant to survive. The faithful were warned to escape, but the vast majority (the unfaithful) would face destruction.

The record of the predicted invasion opens with an unexpected image. The daughter of Zion (Jerusalem) is presented as an attractive and delicate woman (Jer. 5:2; cf. 2:2). The foreign rulers (shepherds) she had courted would come and dwell around her with their people—though not for her pleasure but in hostility and for plunder (6:3), with the intention of destroying the city. The record communicates urgency and ruthlessness; attacking at noon and continuing into the evening and through the night was unusual (vv. 4–5). The invasion would be an act of God, for He commanded the shepherds to make preparations to besiege the city, and it is He who identified Jerusalem to the invaders. God again brings a stern indictment against the oppression and wickedness in Jerusalem’s midst (vv. 6–7).

The prophet finally turns to Jerusalem. He appeals for her to be instructed, take warning, and change, lest God depart from her and she become desolate (v. 8). There was still an opportunity for repentance. Because of God’s love for His people, the judgment brings Him great sorrow. Even if the judgment had to come, the passage as a whole contains subtle hints at the escape of a faithful remnant and a restored covenant. God’s relentless love is always seeking to preserve humanity.

6:9–15. The Judgment Caused by Israel’s Refusal to Hear. This partial dialogue between God and His prophet resembles 5:1–9. The sequence of speakers is the same: the Lord (vv. 1–2; 6:9), Jeremiah (5:3–6; 6:10), and the Lord (5:7–9; 6:11–15). The same key words and themes occur: “the streets of Jerusalem” (khutsot) and “outside” or “the street” (khuts; 5:1; 6:11); the crime of falsehood (sheqer; 5:2; 6:13); the “great” or “leaders” (gadol) among the people (5:5; 6:13); and the judgment labeled as “punishment” (peqad; 5:9; 6:15). The judgment in 6:12–15 also points forward to 8:10–12.

God first described the remnant of Israel as a vine to be reaped and thoroughly gleaned (6:9; cf. 2:21; 5:10). In this metaphor of judgment, God admonished the grape gatherer to relentlessly continue harvesting. Jerusalem and Judah together are called a “remnant of Israel” (6:9), which is language that recalls the destruction of the Northern Kingdom of Israel (722 B.C.). As stated in Isaiah 6:12–13, Judah and Jerusalem were then left as a remnant of God’s people, Israel. A thorough gleaning of the vine does not preclude the preservation of a remnant. God sought to warn the people and to bring them to repentance, but they refused to listen. Their ears were closed (lit. “uncircumcised”)—that is, they were not committed to God—and consequently, they could not receive the word of the Lord (Jer. 6:10; cf. 5:21). It was displeasing and offensive to them, for its content condemned and corrected them (6:10).

The Wrath of God

The biblical language of the wrath of God needs to be understood in its proper context. In Jeremiah, three things should be noted about such language.

1. Wrath, Infidelity, and Rejection. God’s anger is rooted in the metaphor of a betrayed father and an abandoned husband. The infidelity and rejection by His beloved people wounds God’s heart, and this wounded love manifests itself in anger as an expression of deep feelings. These metaphorical expressions should not be taken to mean that God’s anger is exactly like human anger (cf. Is. 55:8–9; Hos. 11:9) but rather to show the similarities of His evaluative and emotional response—which is based on His eternal character—to their apostasy. Human anger usually comes from natural, sinful, and selfish motives, but God’s anger comes from His loving, just, and merciful character. The law played an important function in the life of the covenant people, but they did not establish a relationship with an impersonal law. The covenant was the expression of the disposition of the heart of a redeemed people to remain in a permanent and personal relationship with the Lord. In interpersonal relationships, what a person does or does not do can hurt others. In the covenant relationship, God has a deep respect for His people, and when their actions hurt His loving heart, His love reaches them in the form of disciplinary anger. In such cases, the Lord expects them to return to Him (i.e., to repent).

2. Wrath and Covenant. God's covenant agreement with Israel was a legal contract that included certain lawful punitive measures to be applied to a disloyal partner (see "Covenant," p. 905). Thus, God's anger was part of this contract, in the context of which it represents the discipline applied by the sovereign partner to the violators of the covenant. This was done in order to maintain the spiritual and social order that was created when the covenant relationship was first established. This covenant, based on God's redemptive grace, created a sphere of safety and blessings for His people. When the covenant was violated, the individuals had abandoned the sphere of blessing and, from the legal perspective, they entered the realm of chaos and disorder. But this was not the end of the covenant. God was always ready to direct His anger against Israel's oppressors and against their pride and evil deeds. In such cases, divine wrath brought salvation to His people and destruction on their enemies (Jer. 46:1—51:58).

3. Wrath, Holiness, and Righteousness. God's holiness is like a burning fire that consumes impurity and sin. His righteousness designates His right and lawful actions that are always inseparable from His love. Love is God's faithfulness, grace, and goodness. In Jeremiah, these character traits of God are kept in balance. As an outpouring of righteousness, God's anger (judgment) deals with Israel's guilt for breaking the covenant. As an outpouring of holiness, God's anger is a burning fire that consumes sin and moral defilement. As an outpouring of His love, God's anger is His emotional reaction to the betrayal and rejection by His beloved people. However, since God's love towards the faithful remnant of Israel continues beyond His anger, love dominates His character. The revelation of the supremacy of God's love is found at the heart of the gospel of Jesus Christ, who took upon Himself our violation of the covenant and reconciled us with God (cf. John 3:16–17; 2 Cor. 5:14–21).

The judicial sentence was an expression of God's wrath, which He could not hold in any longer (v. 11). The sentence was an outpouring of His anger on all the people (vv. 11–13). The metaphor of the gleanings of the vine in v. 9 is now explained. Their houses, fields, and wives would be taken by others when God stretched out His hand against the inhabitants of Judah. The Lord said that all of them were given to greed (v. 13), coveting houses, fields, and wives (cf. Deut. 5:21). In the application of the principle of retribution, they would lose houses, fields, and wives (Jer. 6:12). Covetousness, or greed, destroys our inner peace because our trust is placed on the ephemeral instead of on the eternal.

The unit (vv. 9–15) concludes with attention to particulars (vv. 13–15), including God's condemnation of the prophets and priests for proclaiming false messages of peace to the people (cf. 4:10; 5:12–13; 8:11, 15). Because of their shameless actions, He would punish them.

6:16–30. Judgment as "the Fruit of Their Thoughts." God's efforts to save His people had been rejected (v. 16). The people had refused to listen to His prophets (v. 17; cf. v. 27). Therefore, God resumed the lawsuit and invited an assembly of the nations and the earth to be His witnesses (vv. 18–19). The coming judgment was to be the fruit of their makhshaboh—"thoughts," "intentions," or "schemes"—brought by their rejection of the covenant and His law/instruction (torah), which gives life (cf. Ps. 19:7–9). The people had replaced God's word with the performance of temple rituals (Jer. 6:20), but God rejected all of this. They relied on their wealth and material possessions that required no demands for obedience. According to the covenant, obedience to religious ceremonies should not be separated from total submission to the Lord and to His social and moral requirements (cf. 1 Sam. 15:22–23; Hos. 6:6; Amos 5:21–24; Matt. 9:13; 12:7).

Based on this indictment, Jeremiah conveys the Lord's pronouncement of judgment (Jer. 6:21). Instead of Israel walking in the old paths—the good way (for it would give them rest for their souls; v. 16)—God would put stumbling blocks or obstacles in their way, and they would stagger and fall. Here, Jeremiah skillfully contrasts the true covenant with idolatry. Israel was invited to an obedient walk: “old paths” and true obedience to God's word lead to life (vv. 16–19), but ritual activities linked to unfaithfulness are “stumbling blocks” that lead to death (vv. 20–21). God's judgment (4:5–6:30) ends here with a repetition of the invasion of the enemy from the north (6:22–26; cf. 4:5–10) and a reminder of His call to Jeremiah to test Israel's ways (6:27; cf. 1:17–19). The crimes of the people are confirmed, and the verdict is that God has rejected them as rejected silver (6:28–30).

7:1—8:3

Jeremiah's Temple Sermon

This section is probably the clearest statement of the basic themes of the book of Jeremiah. The Temple Sermon has been dated to 609 B.C., in the early reign of Jehoiakim (26:1). The prophet was in deep conflict with the official temple ideology on which Judah relied, and his position was regarded as treason (cf. v. 11). The king and his establishment assumed that Jerusalem could not be violated because God's promises were unconditional. In Jeremiah's day, the royal tradition linked to the temple (cf. Ps. 132:6–10; Is. 37:33–35) had become distorted. Many claimed that the presence of God's throne restricted His judgment against disobedient Israel. This was the grave error Jeremiah attacked in his sermon. The theme is worship (true and false), which necessarily involved the temple. The key word “place” (Heb.

maqom) ties the sermon together (7:3, 6, 12, 14, 20, 32 [sometimes translated as “room”]; 8:3).

7:1–15. True and False Worship. The setting for this speech was the New Gate, which connected the inner and outer temple courts (cf. 26:10). The messenger formula (7:3) names God as yahweh tseba'ot, which is translated variously as “Lord of Hosts,” “Lord Almighty,” or (perhaps most literally) “Lord of Armies,” which was associated with the ark of the covenant and the temple (see “Yahweh Tseba'ot,” p. 912). The sermon began with an exhortation to correct their ways and actions (7:3). It targeted the deceitful royal temple ideology (v. 4). The first argument for the exhortation summarized the covenant principles: fairness in judgment, care for the poor and needy, justice in the temple court (desisting from shedding innocent blood, that is, capital punishment inflicted on innocents), and rejecting idolatry (vv. 5–6). The second argument was a promise to let Judah dwell in the land given to their fathers (v. 7). However, the promise was conditional (i.e., its fulfillment depended on faithfulness to the covenant).

The Lord indicted the people who trusted in worthless lies (vv. 8–11). He challenged his audience with two questions. The first described the perpetrators, providing a sample of Judah's violations of at least five of the Ten Commandments (v. 9). Despite their flagrant and shameful crimes, Judah had the nerve to come before God to claim the covenant promises of salvation (vv. 9–10). God's second question concerned the compatibility of the temple with God's holiness: it had become a den of thieves. The expression “den of thieves/robbers” figuratively refers to a gathering of lawbreakers (see Matt. 21:13). God testified that He had seen it (v. 11). The One worshiped in the temple was Himself the witness. God predicted judgment against Judah (vv. 12–15). It began with a lesson from Shiloh. Judah was

Shiloh

Shiloh in Ephraim was the first dwelling place for the ark of the covenant in the promised land (cf. Josh. 18:1). The ark remained in Shiloh for many years, and the sanctuary in Shiloh was considered to be “God's house” (Judg. 18:31). Following the capture of the ark by the Philistines, it was moved to Kirjath Jerim and stayed in the house of Abinadab for twenty years (1 Sam. 4:1–7:2). Then David moved it to Zion (2 Sam. 6), and finally, Solomon relocated it to the temple in Jerusalem (1 Kin. 8:1–13). It appears that the name Yahweh tseba'ot (see notes on 7:3; cf. 2:14–19) was first used in Shiloh (1 Sam. 1:3; 4:4; cf. notes on Jer. 2:19). In Shiloh, the Lord revealed Himself through His word (1 Sam. 3:21), but it was also a place of priestly abuse (1 Sam. 2:12–17, 22–25) and idolatry (1 Sam. 7:3–4).

Among the prophets, only Jeremiah uses Shiloh as a symbol of God's judgment, which he did when speaking to all of Judah in the temple (7:12, 14; 26:6, 9). The historical books do not directly speak about God's judgment against Shiloh, but Psalm 78 does (vv. 56–64). The psalm describes Israel's having broken the covenant after entering Canaan and how God in His anger deserted the sanctuary of Shiloh and gave His strength and His glory (the ark) into the hands of the enemy (vv. 60–61), referring to the time the Philistines took the ark (1 Sam. 4:1–7:2). The psalm's description of the event closely resembles Jeremiah's judgment speeches (Ps. 78:62–64). The psalm ends with God's rejection of Ephraim (where Shiloh was situated) and His election of the tribe of Judah and His beloved Mount Zion, where "He built His sanctuary like the heights, like the earth," which He has established forever (vv. 67–69). Thus, Shiloh was associated with God's departure from both His sanctuary and His people, His judgment against Israel, and His selection of Zion/Jerusalem for the permanent location of the temple. The symbol of Shiloh was, therefore, particularly meaningful to Jeremiah. Since Judah had turned away from God, God would turn away from the temple as He had done with Shiloh (Jer. 7:14). Instead of learning from the past, the royal establishment was infuriated by the comparison between Jerusalem and Shiloh and sought to kill Jeremiah (26:6, 9).

admonished to notice how God had punished Shiloh because of the wickedness of its people (v. 12). If Shiloh's example would not lead to repentance, the same punishment would be given to Judah (v. 14).

The indictment leading to judgment (v. 13) recalls the accusations in vv. 5–6 and 8–12. God, through His prophets, had been addressing Judah, speaking earnestly and continuously (lit. "rising early and speaking"), but Judah refused to answer His call (v. 13). The temple in Jerusalem would meet the same fate as the temple in Shiloh (v. 14). God would remove Judah from His presence, as He did with the Northern Kingdom of Israel in 722 B.C. (v. 15). God would throw Judah away from Him, as He did with all the descendants of Ephraim (cf. Gen. 48:14–16; Jer. 31:9). The temple building on which Judah had placed its trust (7:4) would be destroyed, and the glory (i.e., the Lord) would depart from Israel (cf. 1 Sam. 4:19–22). This sermon would have shocked the audience.

7:16–20. The Queen of Heaven. In the Hebrew text, this unit opens with a shift in perspective from the people to the person of Jeremiah (cf. 1:15–19). In view of the nature of Judah's crimes, Jeremiah was asked not to intercede for them because God had made up His mind and would not listen (7:16). Their worship of the "queen of heaven" (and other gods) is evidence of their utter rejection of Yahweh (vv. 17–18). The specific identity of the queen of heaven is difficult to determine, but it was most likely an astral deity (see 44:17–19, 25; cf. Amos 5:26).

The indictment in Jeremiah 7:17–18 is connected with the sermon in vv. 1–15, where breaking the Decalogue is referred to (v. 9). The cult of the queen of heaven demonstrates how the breaking of the first commandment leads to the breach of others. Children gathering sticks during the Sabbath was an illegal activity (cf. Num. 15:32–35), as was the kindling of fire (Ex. 35:3). If the pagan cult practices occurred on the Sabbath, they involved several breaches of the Decalogue (cf. Jeremiah's defense of the Sabbath in Jer. 17:19–27). Judah's crimes brought shame and the anger of the Lord upon themselves (7:18–20). The Lord's wrath would be poured out on the temple and the city: on people, animals, and crops (v. 20). Although God was bringing the judgment, the responsibility lay with the people, who were bringing shame upon themselves (v. 19).

7:21–28. Obedience Better than Sacrifice. This unit opens with a shocking command for the people to add burnt offerings to their sacrifices and to eat their meat (v. 21). The burnt offerings were to be completely consumed by fire, but for some other types of sacrifices, the worshiper could eat a portion. God's command to eat the meat of all sacrifices means that He had rejected them and their offerings. This leads to the main point of the unit. During the Exodus from Egypt, God did not command Israel to offer burnt offerings and sacrifices but to obey/hear His voice. Such submission to Him was to indicate that the Lord was Israel's God and Israel His people. In order that it might be well with Israel, they were to walk in all the ways that God commanded them (vv. 22–23). The moral and social obligations of the covenant could not be superseded by the performance of ritual acts. Religion and morality stood together. Judah's trust in the temple cult was futile if they did not hear and obey the voice of the Lord in His covenant law.

The verdict, stated four times (vv. 24, 26, 27, 28), was that Israel did not listen. It signaled four indictments against the people: (a) they were led by their evil hearts (v. 24), (b) they refused to listen to God's prophets (vv. 25–26; cf. v. 13), (c) they would not obey/hear God's word through Jeremiah (v. 27), and (d) they were a disobedient and incorrigible nation who had lost the truth (v. 28). Judah had rejected the covenant, and God was compelled to answer by rejecting them to their detriment.

7:29—8:3. Judgment on False Worship. The people were told to lament their rejection by God by cutting off their hair, which was a mourning practice (v. 29; see Job 1:20). The desolate or barren heights symbolize Judah as the object of God's wrath (cf. Jer. 7:34). An indictment (vv. 30–31) is followed by judgment and desolation (vv. 32–34). The indictment targeted the idolatry in the temple, which had polluted its holiness—shiqquts (“abominations” or “detestable things”) refers to altars dedicated to idols in the temple area from the time of Manasseh (2 Kin. 21:1–5). These also included the high places of Tophet(h)—namely, sites for idolatry in the Valley of the Son of (ben) Hinnom, outside Jerusalem (referred to as “Gehennah” in NT times).

At the judgment, the Valley of Hinnom would be called “the Valley of Slaughter” (Jer. 7:32). In dishonor, the fallen of Judah would be buried

Tophet(h)

The Valley of Hinnom was a steep-sided valley associated with burning—both of garbage at the city dump and of children in sacrifices at the “Tophet(h)” (lit. “hearth,” “fireplace”). Child sacrifices appear to have been common among the Canaanites and were sometimes practiced in Israel (2 Kin. 16:3; 21:6). Josiah's attempt to eradicate the rite (2 Kin. 23:10) was reversed under Jehoiakim. The references to child sacrifice in Ezekiel (20:25–26) indicate that it was common in Judah before Jerusalem's destruction in 586 B.C. God condemned the practice as contrary to His will (Jer. 7:31; 19:4–5).

there, and when graves could no longer hold the bodies, birds and beasts would consume the corpses (v. 33). The desolation of the land would bring an end to joy and gladness in the cities of Judah and the streets of Jerusalem (v. 34).

Expanding the theme of vv. 32–34, this unit also mocks the peoples' idolatrous astral worship. The bones of all the dead in Judah would be placed before the astral deities whom the people of Judah had loved, served, followed, sought for advice, and worshiped (8:2). God should have been the object of these devotions, and by applying this terminology to the people's idolatry, the seriousness of the rebellion is vividly depicted. The bones of the people would be dishonored because they would be left unburied (cf. 7:33). This drastic message paints a picture of the complete annihilation of Judah. Choosing idols instead of the Lord meant choosing death instead of life.

8:4—10:25

No Balm in Gilead

This section depicts the people of Judah and Jerusalem as an ailing community approaching death. The diverse themes in this section are worked out in rich and imaginative language.

8:4–17. Peril of False Teaching. An indictment concerning Judah's failure (vv. 4–13) is followed by the Lord's judgment through an invading army (vv. 14–17). For Judah, only faithfulness to the covenant could provide life and peace. Abandoning the Lord removes any protection against the surrounding nations and brings judgment. The first part of the indictment resumes the theme of “turning” (3:1–4:4; 15:1–21). The Hebrew word shub—“turn,” “return”—is used six times in 8:4–6. God's deepest desire was that Judah would return to covenant loyalty. However, the prophet laments that God's people do not know His principles, contrasting Judah with birds who instinctually know the time of their migration (v. 7). Even the animals had a better sense of order and propriety than Judah.

The supposedly wise leaders who handled the instruction of the covenant and the scribes who had produced the writings were unreliable (v. 8) because they had rejected the true word of God and lacked wisdom (v. 9b). Therefore, at the judgment, they would be ashamed (loss of external honor), dismayed (loss of inner peace), and captured (loss of land; v. 9a). True discernment comes from a deep knowledge of the word of God. The statement of their judgment (vv.

10–12) is almost identical to 6:12–15. Their wives and fields would be given to others because of their unlawful desire and deceit (8:10). The false teachers could provide only temporary remedies to Judah's troubles. They taught that "all is well," but the approaching judgment would bring destruction (v. 11). The judgment speech against the wise ends with a summary of the theme of the loss of wives and fields (vv. 10, 13).

Those who were attacked sought refuge in the fortified cities and resigned themselves to God's punishment of drinking poisoned water (v. 14; the LXX and the MT [as well as the different English translations that rely on them] differ in regard to whether the people were resigning themselves to death [LXX—lit. "jumping overboard"] or being silent [MT]). Here they finally acknowledge that they have sinned against the Lord. The metaphor of drinking poison may imply a trial by ordeal (cf. Num. 5:11–31), which suits the marriage metaphor of Israel as wife and the Lord as husband. This practice was used to ascertain whether or not a man's wife had been unfaithful. If she got sick from the bitter water, she was guilty and would be rejected by the husband and become infertile. This imagery also fits the metaphor of the people's ill health, with neither a balm in Gilead nor a physician to bring them healing (8:15, 22).

The people looked for peace, but there was none. They expected healing, but there was only distress (v. 15; cf. 14:19). This was a rejection of the message of the false teachers who proclaimed peace (vv. 8–12). Jeremiah states the unfortunate fact that there would be no recovery for unfaithful Judah (v. 22). Instead, the people could already hear the snorting of horses coming from the land of the tribe of Dan (cf. 4:15), where the invading armies were first seen. The army was like a beast that had come to "devour" the land and its inhabitants, bringing death and destruction (v. 16). The invading army sent by the Lord is described as venomous vipers that cannot be charmed (i.e., they are merciless and cannot be controlled; v. 17). The snake's bites fit the theme of illness in this section; there would be no healing for the people. The devastating judgment was a way of urging God's people to confession and repentance (vv. 14–15).

8:18–9:3. Mourning for an Unfaithful People. The mixed sequence of speakers in 8:18–21 derives from Jeremiah's role as both a prophet and intercessor. The meaningful order in the sequence is supported by a chiasmic structure, which forms a dialogue between the pretense of the worshiping community of Israel and the corresponding empathy of Jeremiah with his people (cf. Introduction). This may be displayed as follows:

- A Sorrow (vv. 18–19a)
- B Question of the people concerning salvation relating to God's presence (v. 19b)
- C God's question of indictment and indignation (v. 19c)
- B' Question of the people concerning salvation relating to God's timing (v. 20)
- A' Sorrow (v. 21)

The speaker in vv. 18–19a and 21 could be Jeremiah or the Lord. If Jeremiah is the speaker, he would be demonstrating his heartsickness at the fate of his fellow Israelites. If God is the speaker, He would be stating that He saw and shared in the suffering of His people. Yet the people, who had brought about their own anguish, did not know or care. Their questions in vv. 19b–20 show that they continued to misinterpret the covenant. The temple was no longer God's place, and His promises were not being fulfilled because of the people's disobedience (7:1–8:3). Therefore, God's saving presence was no longer among them (v. 19c), and consequently, His anger was provoked (cf. 6:9–15).

Continuing this line of inquiry from vv. 18–21 and using "healing" as a metaphor for salvation, God asked three questions in v. 22. Gilead was a region east of Jordan, famous for its medicinal herbs (Gen. 37:25), but even there no remedy could be found for Judah's illness! There was no immediate healing for unfaithful Judah. God's protection and care depended on Judah's relationship with Him. Idolatry placed Judah outside of the covenant relationship in a world of chaos. Jeremiah's answer to the questions in Jeremiah 8:22 expresses a mixture of feelings. He wept for their dead (9:1; cf. 8:18, 21), but he also wished to depart from them into the wilderness (9:2). God, the speaker, then accused the people of speaking lies and of not knowing Him (v. 3). The verb "to know" is a covenant term for the intimate relationship between the Lord and His people (cf. 8:7, 12).

9:4–16. Punished by Desolation. This unit addresses social and relational crimes rooted in deceitful self-seeking and the fertility cult. The outcome would be desolation of the cities through death and exile. But God's ultimate purpose was to refine and test His people. The covenant required honesty and care for one's neighbor, but the people of Judah demonstrated through their deceit that they did not know God (vv. 3, 6). "To know" in Hebrew goes beyond mere mental cognizance—it often implies a strong relationship (cf. Gen. 4:1). Accordingly, some translations render yada' here as "acknowledge" or "take into account." The warning against friends' and relatives' deception in 9:4 involves the Hebrew phrase 'aqob ya'qob, which may be an allusion to Jacob's deceitful dealing with his brother Esau (cf. Gen. 27:36). None of the people were to be trusted to tell the truth; they were all living in an environment of deceit (Jer. 9:5–6). Here "deceit" consists of speaking lies and practicing wrongdoings. A loving relationship with God is deeply connected to a loving relationship with our neighbor; loving one leads to loving the other (cf. Matt. 22:34–40).

The idea that the Lord of Hosts would refine and try, or test, His people (Jer. 9:7) had been expressed before (e.g., 5:10, 6:27). The word tsarap—"refine"—is associated with the melting of metal (cf. v. 30). "Refine" is in parallel with "try" or "test," which may also refer to refining metal (cf. Job 23:10; Zech. 13:9). These verbs allude to the hope that God would not entirely abandon His people and that repentance was still possible. This is followed by an indictment (Jer. 9:8) that deepens the theme of the people's deceitfulness. Deceitful speech is like a arrow because what it says is denied through its actions: the tongue speaks peaceably but the heart lies in wait to destroy.

The questions in v. 9 indicate that God would punish and avenge Himself on the nation of Judah. God had to be avenged because His honor was at stake. He would not be mocked or manipulated, not even by His covenant partner. The judgment would be God's way of saying "I am God." This theme belongs to the cosmic conflict, where God's character is at stake and where His Son fully reveals His character as redeeming love. In Christ's redemptive work, judgment condemns the wicked and brings salvation to those who see God's saving power in Him.

The announcement of judgment is expressed in a lamentation (v. 10). There would be weeping and wailing for the burned-up and lifeless land—it was completely desolated. The breaking down of mutual social trust creates an atmosphere of suspicion and death. When God is left out of our social interactions, we will experience psychological and, in some cases, physical desolation. Judgment is the demonstration of God's disapproval of destructive human and social behavior.

In v. 12, the reflections on judgment are summarized in three rhetorical questions. First, it is asked, who has true wisdom to understand the desolation of Jerusalem and Judah? Only through the word of God, which interprets history from a divine perspective, could such wisdom be obtained (cf. vv. 13–16). Second, to whom had the Lord spoken who might explain or declare it? The word of God was given to His prophet (cf. e.g., 1:4–19; 6:27). Thirdly, why had the desolation of the land come? This question seeks the reason for the judgment, and the answer is found in an indictment (9:13–14) and the juridical sentence (vv. 15–16). The indictment is structured in terms of chiasmic contrasts:

- A Forsaking the law/instruction (torah) that God had given
- B Not walking according to or following God's voice
- B' Walking according to or following their own hearts
- A' Walking after or following the Baals, as their fathers taught them

This is a question of choice (i.e., God, the Baals, or one's own heart), a choice directly related to the covenant law. Deuteronomy 29:14–19 defines faithfulness to the covenant in three ways, present also in Jeremiah 9:13–16: (1) not turning away from God to serve other gods (cf. v. 14); (2) avoiding the la'anah—"wormwood," "bitterness," or "poison" of idolatry (cf. v. 15; 8:14; 23:15; Lam. 3:15, 19; Amos 6:12); and (3) never assuming that they would be blessed despite following the dictates of their own hearts (Deut. 29:19; cf. Jer. 9:14). Now the Lord would feed His people with bitter, even poisonous, food and water (v. 15). Jeremiah had adapted the phrase to the symbol of the bitter water (see commentary on 8:4–17).

Jeremiah 9:16 alludes to Leviticus 26:32–33, which is set in the context of covenant promises of blessing and retribution (Lev. 26:1–46; cf. Deut. 7:12–24; 28:1–68). God would (a) desolate the land, (b) scatter them among the nations, and (c) pursue them with the sword of warfare (Jer. 9:11–16; Lev. 26:27, 32–33). Thus, the answers to the questions in Jeremiah 9:12, about the wisdom, the word of the Lord, and the reason for the desolation, are found in the covenant law that Jeremiah applies to Judah (vv. 13–16).

9:17–26. The People Mourn in Judgment. This section joins together several themes: (a) the previous theme of public mourning (v. 10) is further developed (vv. 17–22); (b) covenantal faith and Judah's self-sufficiency are articulated as two ways of life (vv. 23–24); and (c) God's judgment of the nations (vv. 25–26; cf. 46:1–51:58). The people were invited to imagine that the worst would happen in order to prepare for it (9:17–22). Public lamentation requires skillful experts, and specialists were summoned to mourn and teach their daughters and neighbors a lamentation for the death of their children and young men (vv. 17–21). Death would enter through the windows and take over the palaces, or fortresses, and the open streets of the entire city. The corpses would fall like refuse (v. 22; cf. 7:32–33). This would be a time of sorrowful mourning.

God set two ways of life before Judah (9:23–24). He had created human beings with glory and honor (cf. Ps. 8:5) and wanted them to preserve this noble state. One option would be to follow the human way of wisdom, power, and riches. These are condemned as tokens of self-sufficiency. The opposite option is khesed—"loving-kindness," "love," "fidelity," "judgment," "justice," and "righteousness" (i.e., God's character) because He delights in these things. This way of life consists of understanding and knowing God, and it leads to humility and dependency on Him.

The unit closes by pointing to the coming days of retribution (vv. 25–26). God charged His people with being uncircumcised in their hearts (v. 26), identifying them as no different from the surrounding nations (v. 25). Being equal to the other nations meant losing their special election and covenant relationship. It also meant sharing the destiny that sooner or later reaches every nation: invasion, death, and destruction. God is indeed a God of justice.

10:1–16. Idols and the True God. The comparison between idols and the true God develops and explains the two ways of life in 9:23–24. The point is to warn against learning the way of the nations (or Gentiles) (v. 2). Verses 2–16 mock the idols and praise God's sovereignty. They present the idols as having no knowledge or power and being unable to do anything (vv. 4–5, 14). Jeremiah presents the idols made by human hands (vv. 3–4, 9) as completely stupid (v. 8), false, and futile (vv. 14–15); and, as worthless teachers (v. 8), they could not impart knowledge. They would perish at their time of punishment (v. 15; cf. v. 11). In contrast, there is none like Yahweh (vv. 6–7, 16). He is the powerful Creator of the world (vv. 12, 16), the mighty King of the nations (vv. 7, 10), and Israel belongs to Him (v. 16). He is the great, true, and living God (vv. 6, 10), the Lord of nature, rain, and wind (v. 13), worthy of being feared (v. 7; cf. v. 5). His wrath makes the earth tremble, and the nations cannot endure it (v. 10). He is Israel's God, and His name is great. He is yahweh tseba'ot—"Lord of Hosts," "Lord of Armies," or "Lord Almighty" (vv. 6, 16; see "Yahweh Tseba'ot," p. 912).

10:17–25. The Coming Captivity of Judah.

Jeremiah urged Judah to prepare for the approaching judgment (vv. 17–18). He summoned the inhabitants of the city fortress to flee or prepare for exile, for God would expel the people (suddenly and violently) from their land (v. 18).

This dramatic scene is followed by a lamentation over the invasion from the north (vv. 19–22). The exclamation of "woe" (v. 19) is an expression of anguish in the face of death and the loss of home and children (v. 20). The speaker from the countryside tells about the setting up of tents for homes (v. 20). The shepherds designate the leaders, and the scattering of the flock refers to the Exile (v. 21). The leaders had not asked the Lord for guidance. It is only in v. 22 that the invasion from the north emerges as the instrument to turn the cities of Judah into a place of jackals (cf. 9:11).

The unit concludes with a prayer of repentance (10:23–24). The prophet asks that God's anger be expressed for the purpose of correction and justice, not complete annihilation (v. 24). He also asks God to direct His wrath toward the pagan nations, who do not know Him (that is, do not appropriately acknowledge Him), and toward those who do not call upon His name (v. 25a–b). Because Judah faced the oppression of the nations (v. 25c–d), its salvation would require the destruction of their power. Later on in the book, the prayer for judgment against the nations is answered (chaps. 25, 46–51), but only after the defeat of Judah and Jerusalem. Jeremiah presents God's punishment of His people as irrevocable, but for the enduring faithful, there was hope for a return to the land. This hope was based on understanding that God directs humanity's steps (10:23–24).

11:1–17

The Broken Covenant

This section has been called a meditation on Deuteronomy 6:4 or a theological treatise on the covenant. In the treatise, God's people must "hear" and "obey" the central tenet of the covenant (i.e., to love the Lord with all their heart, with all their soul, and with all their strength).

Without this, Israel loses both its identity as a people and God's special protection, thus becoming an object of the power struggles of the nations, which leads to destruction.

11:1–5. Covenant Foundation. This unit has three parts. First, the Lord said that Judah and Jerusalem are required to listen to the content of the covenant (cf. Deut. 6:4). To listen or hear in this context means to “obey” because the covenant impacts every aspect of one's life (vv. 2–3). Second, the Israel of old obediently listened to God's voice when He articulated the covenant formula (v. 4). Contemporary Judah and Jerusalem were here invited to do the same. But in this case, the message begins with the curse against those refusing to hear/obey (v. 3). The blessings are left out because priests and prophets had blindly overemphasized them by teaching that God would grant peace despite flagrant violations of the covenant. Third, the covenant was God's way of keeping His oath to the fathers and His promise to give Israel the land of Canaan (v. 5). This promise was significant in Jeremiah's setting. Facing a threat from an invading army and the immediate prospect of extermination, exile, and loss of land, this promise gave hope to Judah. But the people at large failed to fulfill the condition of the promise, which was faith in God. It was Jeremiah's task to remind them of this conditional element.

11:6–8. Covenant Violation (Ancient). The unit is structured as a proclamation of the covenant requirements (v. 6), a summary of the history of God's instruction to Israel through the prophets (v. 7), and an indictment (v. 8a) followed by judgment (v. 8b). God recalled how He had, through His prophets, reminded Israel to obey the covenant (v. 7). Since they did not listen to Him, God would not listen to them (v. 11), and the covenant curses would be enforced (cf. Deut. 28).

11:9–17. Covenant Violation (Contemporary). God revealed to Jeremiah a conspiracy against the covenant. Judah and Jerusalem were accused of breaking the covenant and following other gods (vv. 9–10). God's response was an irrevocable judgment (v. 11) and a refusal to listen to their complaints (cf. 10:23–25). All the cities of Judah worshiped Baal, and in every street in Jerusalem, there was an altar of incense to Baal (11:13). These gods were incapable of saving Judah on the day of trouble (v. 12). Verses 14–17 expand the point in v. 11 that God would not listen to Judah when they cried out to Him

(v. 14). The judgment was final. Judah could not be saved by formal rites in the sanctuary while worshiping other gods (v. 15; cf. 2:2). Although the Lord referred to Judah as a beautiful, thriving, fruitful, and green olive tree (11:16–17; cf. 2:21; 8:13; 11:19; 17:8), their covenant crimes had provoked His anger to such a point that He allowed the invaders to burn and break this flourishing tree (11:16b–17).

11:18–12:17

Confessions, Punishment, and Redemption

In this section we find the first two Confessions in Jeremiah (see Jeremiah: Introduction). One is linked to a plot to kill Jeremiah (11:18–23), and the other concerns Jeremiah's questioning of God's judgment (12:1–6). The section closes with a description of God's work of punishment and redemption (vv. 7–17).

11:18–23. Jeremiah's Life Threatened. Following the conventional structure of the lament prayer, the first Confession includes invocation and complaint (vv. 18–19), petition (v. 20), and divine response (vv. 21–23).

1. Invocation and Complaint (vv. 18–19). Jeremiah was initially unaware of the plot against him, but God informed him of it (cf. 12:6) and identified people from Anathoth—Jeremiah's hometown—as the ones who were trying to kill him (11:19, 21). Through the complaint, the Israelites expressed the troubles they faced, hoping for a positive divine response. In his complaint, Jeremiah accused the people from his own town of plotting against him. Drawing on the familiar language of the lament (cf. Ps. 44:11, 22), he describes himself as a lamb brought to the slaughter. God quoted the words of the conspirators who intended to destroy Jeremiah so that his name would not be remembered any more. Being unmarried and having no children (Jer. 16:2), Jeremiah would leave no descendants to continue his line or to remember him. His ministry challenged the royal temple ideology (cf. chap. 7), and his priestly family (1:1; 12:6) regarded him as a threat to their status and ambitions (v. 21).

2. Petition (v. 20). Jeremiah turns to the Lord of Hosts as the righteous Judge, praying for the Lord's vengeance on his enemies. The Hebrew naqam may be used as a noun (“vengeance”) or a verb (“avenge”) and is used to express the idea that God cares for the cause of the innocent (11:20; 15:15; 20:12) or that He deals with the adversaries of His oppressed people (46:10; 50:15, 28; 61:6, 11, 36). The term expresses justice. The plot against Jeremiah was a response to what he prophesied in the name of the Lord (11:21), so he invokes God's promised protection (cf. 1:18–19; 15:20–21).

3. Divine Response (vv. 21–23). As the judge in a court, God gave His verdict and sentenced the men of Anathoth. What they had plotted against Jeremiah would now fall upon them. The divine judgment confirms the reliability of the words of His prophet.

12:1–6. Jeremiah's Question and the Lord's

Answer. Jeremiah's second Confession may also be divided into invocation and complaint (vv. 1–2), petition (vv. 3–4), and divine response (vv. 5–6).

1. Invocation and Complaint (12:1–2). In his prayer, Jeremiah first acknowledges that God is righteous (v. 1a). The complaint concerns God's judgments and the reliability of God to care for His faithful covenant partners. Jeremiah asks why wicked people prosper (cf. Job 21:7). Put another way, is there a gap between God's righteousness and His allowance of evil? The prayer does not seek an explanation but is rather an accusation of God that anticipates a reaction.

2. Petition (12:3–4). Since God is righteous (v. 1) and knew Jeremiah's innocence, a righteous judgment is proposed against the wicked oppressors. The wicked should be set for slaughter—what his adversaries in Anathoth proposed for him, he now wishes for them (cf. 11:19; 12:6). Jeremiah's argument is that the severe drought, caused by the wicked, would damage all, righteous and wicked, faithful and unfaithful. This raises the question of how God would righteously deal with the faithful remnant in Judah and Jerusalem when the approaching judgment became reality.

3. Divine Response (12:5–6). A supportive answer could be expected in light of the assurances in 1:8 and 19, but God's answer comes as a surprise—a warning that something worse was yet to come! The present ordeal compared to the tribulation to come was like becoming weary by running with people on foot (present) and then having to contend with horses (future). Or it is like feeling exhausted in a cultivated land of peace (present) and then having to dwell in the floodplain of Jordan, with its heat, humidity, wild vegetation, and animals (future). Thus, God intensified the judgment theme. Jeremiah would have to live in continued uncertainty about the issue of God's righteousness. In the meantime, the righteous and faithful, of necessity, were to wait for and trust in the Lord. The same was taught by Jesus in His parable of the wheat and the tares (Matt. 13:24–30). The saints in the end time are admonished to have patience until the time of the harvest, even if some “die in the Lord” (Rev. 14:12–20). God's response, in sum, avoids the issue of His justice but urges the faithful to trust and obey Him. At the present time, the solution to suffering and injustice is not to be found in how the world operates but in one's relationship with God, which involves patiently waiting for His salvation.

12:7–17. Punishment and Redemption. Next, God spoke in a different tone. He pronounced a judgment that caused Him pain and grief, like a loving husband who must abandon His unfaithful and yet dearly beloved wife (v. 7; cf. 2:2). God had been compelled to give her into the hand of her enemies (12:7), despite her crying out against Him like a lion (v. 8). The Lord described her as being like a vulture under the attack of other vultures (or other birds of prey) and wild beasts (v. 9). This probably refers to the rulers' destruction and desolation of the vineyard of the Lord (vv. 10–12). God's people had sown wheat but reaped thorns because of His fierce anger (v. 13). God's righteousness requires judgment, and the faithful are asked to wait and trust in Him. Because of the faithful remnant, God would bring back the exiles and offer them a new covenant (vv. 14–17).

13:1–27

The Pride of the Chosen People

There are three units in this chapter that make the same point in strikingly different ways: the symbol of the linen garment (vv. 1–11), the symbol of the wineskins (or wine bottles; vv. 12–14), and the description of how the people's pride would be followed by captivity (vv. 15–27). All announce a verdict based on Judah's conduct and underscore the fact of God's justification in His decision.

13:1–14. The Symbols of the Linen Sash and the Wine Bottles.

As the linen 'ezor—translated variously as “sash,” “loincloth” or “undergarment”—clings or is bound to the waist of a person, so God had made all Israel “cling” to Him for His renown, praise, honor, and glory (v. 11). This indictment is illustrated by three symbolic actions on the part of Jeremiah. He was to put a linen garment around his waist (vv. 1–2), go to the river Euphrates and hide it in a hole in the rock (vv. 3–5), and, after some time, return to find it ruined (vv. 6–7). In the same manner, God would ruin the pride of Judah and Jerusalem, manifested in their apostasy (vv. 10, 27). Like bottles or wineskins being filled with wine (v. 12), God would fill all Judah with drunkenness and dash them against each other. His destruction of Judah is irrevocable and will be implemented without mercy (vv. 13–14). These emphatic and harsh messages of judgment provide the background for Judah's two options in vv. 15–19.

13:15–27. Pride Precedes Captivity. Twice, the prophet asked Judah to listen in order to choose (vv. 15, 17). There was still time to hear God's word, to repent and obey, even with the looming judgment. Repentance would mean giving glory to the Lord their God (cf. Rev. 14:7) before He brought calamity (v. 16). Giving glory to God implies true worship and humility (abandoning pride)—the path to life (vv. 16, 18). There was a second option—pride or arrogance, an attitude of disobedience, which included a lack of humility and led to shame (vv. 9, 15, 17, 18, 22, 26–27). It would result in death, captivity, weeping, and the collapse of the state, the splendid crowns (vv. 16–19, 24–27). Humility breeds glory, but pride generates shame. The shaming of Jerusalem (the unfaithful wife) through judgment (vv. 22, 26–27) would be a consequence of the shaming of the Lord (the faithful husband) through adulterous defilement (vv. 26–27). Justice in the covenant context would be brought by the curses and blessings generated by Israel's conduct (see Deut. 28; cf. Jer. 16:10–17:18), but the Lord's love and mercy would be received in humility.

14:1—15:21

Personal Experiences of the Prophet

God's relentless pursuit of righteousness and justice in the face of apostasy continues. It is mingled here, however, with the people's collective prayers of lament and the life and experiences of Jeremiah. He was both an intercessor for his people (of which he was himself a part) and a spokesperson for God (who had called him).

14:1–22. The Word Concerning the Droughts.

Severe droughts in Judah had hit both farmers and nobles. Threatened by death, the people turned to God, confessing their sins and appealing to Him for His name's sake (vv. 7–9). God was merciful, faithful, and loving (see, e.g., Ps. 136; Jer. 33:11; Lam. 3:22–26). The appeal to God's name was a request for Him to act according to His character. In a desperate prayer, the people addressed God as Israel's Hope and Savior (Jer. 14:8). The people pleaded with God to not leave or forsake them, but God's answer was one of rejection (v. 10). The nation had broken the covenant, and the consequences were inevitable.

The people's prayer of lament was interrupted by God commanding Jeremiah to stop interceding for them (vv. 11–18). God would neither listen to them (for they were not listening to Him) nor accept them, regardless of their (dishonest) offerings. Instead, He would consume them by sword, famine, and plagues (vv. 12–16). Judah had lost the covenant blessings and was experiencing the curses. God particularly condemned the false prophets prophesying peace in His name (vv. 13–18). He denied any responsibility for the 'elil ("worthless" or "idolatrous") "words"—divinations and visions—flowing from their deceptive minds (Heb. leb—often translated as "heart" but also inclusive of the mind—both thinking and feeling). They all would be under the curse of the sword, famine, and pestilence (vv. 15–16). By quoting from God's previous judgment, Jeremiah reinforces it.

Verses 17–18 describe God's personal empathy for His people, expressed in a lament after the execution of judgment. The lament blames the devastation on the prophets and priests who failed to acknowledge that the land was God's gift, which could be retained only when the people remained faithful to Him. After the devastating judgment, the land would belong to strangers while God's people wandered around in an unknown land (v. 18). The people's lament continues in vv. 19–22. Three questions are asked in v. 19 regarding whether God (1) had rejected Judah fully, (2) loathed/despised Zion, and (3) had wounded them so deeply that they could not be healed. The people seem to have known the answers, for they confessed their guilt (or iniquity) as well as that of their ancestors; they had sinned against God (v. 20). They prayed for rain (v. 22), which was included in the covenant blessings (v. 21c). Two arguments provided the basis for this request. First, God was petitioned to act for His name's sake (cf. vv. 9b, 21a), to avoid disgracing His glorious throne, and to avoid breaking His covenant with them (v. 21b). Second, they acknowledged that the idols of the nations and the heavens (astral deities) were not saviors and that they could not bring rain. They recognized that only God has such power. The prayer concludes with a commitment to wait for the Lord, for He had made all the nations and the heavens (v. 22).

15:1–9. The Lord Will Not Relent. Answering the people's prayer in 14:19–22, God declared that His verdict against the people remained (15:1–9). This is followed by a reflective lament by Jeremiah (vv. 10–18) and a conditional assurance by God (vv. 19–21). The decision to punish Judah was final (vv. 1–4). Intercession for the people was pointless. If intercession was rejected by God, then only curses remained, and these are symbolized by the four destroyers: death, sword, famine, and captivity (v. 2). The phrase “let them go” (at the end of v. 1) was once God's liberating command to Pharaoh (Ex. 5:1), but now He used it to express rejection and their return to bondage (Jer. 15:1). Four forms of destruction were appointed: sword, dogs, birds, and wild animals that would slay, drag, devour, and destroy (v. 3). The nations of the earth are depicted as wild animals destroying the flock of lambs, which are identified as God's people (e.g., 13:17, 20; 23:2–3; such metaphors are possibly the root images of the “beasts” in the visions of Daniel 7–8). Largely because of Manasseh's reign of bloodshed and apostasy, Judah would become repulsive to all the nations of the earth (Jer. 15:4; cf. 2 Kin. 21; 23:26; 24:3).

Through rhetorical questions, God revealed to Jerusalem that no one would pity her, cry over her, or inquire about her (Jer. 15:5; cf. 30:14). Since Jerusalem had forsaken the Lord, no one would care about her (v. 6a). This is an implied call for her to return to the Lord. Israel's persistent refusal to change had made God weary of relenting (v. 6). The metaphor of “winnowing” (i.e., separating the grain from husks at harvest time) is used to illustrate the coming terrifying judgment (v. 7; cf. 51:2). In permitting the nations to bring down Judah, God would winnow the people (i.e., their children would die, the number of widows would increase, mothers would feel anguish and terror, and even the “remnant” [normally the survivors] would be killed by the sword, vv. 7–9). This was not what God wanted, but Judah had brought it upon themselves by their refusal to return to Him as their only safety (v. 7). Punishment in the form of chastisement had become punishment by destruction, for God's patience had come to an end.

15:10–21. Jeremiah's Dejection and Reassurance. This unit constitutes Jeremiah's third Confession (see Jeremiah: Introduction). It consists of Jeremiah's personal woe (v. 10), a response by God promising a remnant and repeating the judgment (vv. 11–14), a prayer by Jeremiah asking God to save him from his persecutors (vv. 15–18), and a reassurance by God linked to Jeremiah's call (vv. 19–21; cf. 1:17–19).

Jeremiah's woe is a bitter complaint addressed to his mother for having borne him (15:10; cf. 20:14–18). Jeremiah became a man of contention to the whole land (v. 10b) because he was called to preach unpopular messages that undermined the royal ideology and the order of the Judean state. His claim that he had not lent or received loans with interest (v. 10c) is a figure of speech (synecdoche) where a part of the covenant law represents the totality of the law. The covenant law stipulated that it was unlawful to lend money to the poor with interest (Ex. 22:25–27; Lev. 25:35–37). By mentioning this specific law, Jeremiah claimed to be obedient to the covenant law. Since his prayer of lament is sincere and just, not like that of unfaithful Judah, he knew that God would hear him.

God first assured Jeremiah (Jer. 15:11). The Hebrew text at the beginning of the verse is uncertain. Some translate it as “it will be well with your remnant” while others render it as “I will deliver [or free] you for good [or good purposes].” God then identified the coming enemy, the northern iron and bronze, as one that no one could break (v. 12). God's anger would remove personal and national wealth (e.g., the temple vessels and furnishings; v. 13; cf. 52:17–23), and the people would be exiled to a country unknown to them (15:14; cf. 6:9–15). Verses 10–14 move uncompromisingly from the land of contention (v. 10) to the land of exile (v. 14). In vv. 15–18, Jeremiah resumes his prayer, requesting God's intervention and explaining why God should hear him (vv. 15–17). He claims to be innocent and righteous and to belong to God, while being filled with words (which he “ate”) of judgment and God's anger (v. 16a). This leads to a complaint which resembles an accusation against God (v. 18). Jeremiah refers to his suffering and needs as a perpetual pain and an incurable wound. From the context, Jeremiah seems to have suffered an affliction caused by his prophetic ministry and by God. Thus, in the last lines of v. 18, drawing on the well-known motif of a tree planted by a river symbolizing a righteous person (e.g., Ps. 1:3; Jer. 17:8), Jeremiah asks God why He seems to be like failing streams of water, deceptive and unreliable. His complaint, therefore, is rooted in the conviction that he had been faithful to his prophetic call and yet had not received God's promised protection and blessing (1:8, 17–19).

In His answer (vv. 19–21), God assured Jeremiah of deliverance from the wicked. God does indeed care about the faithful. However, the Lord began by putting a condition before His prophet, built on a play on the Hebrew word shub, “turn” (it occurs four times in v. 19; cf. 3:1–4:4; 8:4–17). The Hebrew text may be translated as “If you will return (shub), I will return (shub).... They will turn (shub) to you, but you shall not turn (shub) to them.” The carefully constructed statement sets out the condition for a new covenant based on a new faithfulness. The first two occurrences of the verb shub, “turn,” concern Jeremiah's relation to the Lord. He had accused God of being like an “unreliable stream,” and the Lord wanted him to turn to Him with renewed faithfulness and to trust Him. Only then did God promise to sustain him. The second pairing of the same verb concerns Jeremiah and his persecutors. God promised that when Jeremiah turned to Him with renewed faithfulness, his opponents would yield to him, but he should never yield to them. Thus, the promises depended on Jeremiah's new obedience, which would change his relation to God and to the people. God would restore him, and his human opponents would submit to him. Jeremiah serves here as a model for God's faithful people. A foundation was laid for a covenant reorientation that would give the community hope for the future. Thus, in the dialogue between Jeremiah and God in chapter 15, steps were taken that would lead to a new covenant (see chaps. 30–33).

The exchange between Jeremiah and God may be read and understood on several levels. First, it is the prayer of a faithful person in need of God's faithful response, which he received. Secondly, it is the prayer of a prophet who had been charged to proclaim the painful and dangerous word that Jerusalem would perish, and the question was whether God, the Originator of the word, would stand by His prophet, the carrier of the word. If God did not sustain the messenger, the message would not be taken seriously because the prophet would then lose his credibility. If the message was about God's righteousness and the righteousness of His covenant that was broken by Israel/Judah, then God was also obliged, by His own righteousness, to stand by the righteous messenger proclaiming His word. In this dialogue, Jeremiah is seeking God's protection and arguing with Him on the basis of His righteousness, and God responds by assuring Jeremiah that He will be with him and save him (15:20; cf. 1:8, 19). Third, Jeremiah's personal prayer may be read as a word of assurance to the people of God after the destruction of Jerusalem. He is a paradigm, an example of God's new community. God's servants, who “find the words of God” and “eat them” and to whom His word brings joy (15:16), will be like a fortified bronze wall—despite opposition and persecution, God will be with them and save them (vv. 20–21). The passage brings hope, therefore, to God's “end-time people.”

16:1–21

Symbolic Actions and Restoration

Jeremiah 16 discusses two prophetic, symbolic actions illustrating the impending doom of Judah (vv. 1–13). This is followed by a message of hope that does not ignore the sins of the people (vv. 14–18) and a concluding message of hope for the nations (vv. 19–21).

16:1–13. Symbolic Actions of Doom. The Lord first commanded Jeremiah not to take a wife or have children “in this place” (vv. 2–4). Jerusalem and Judah were under curse, and all the living—fathers, mothers, sons, and daughters—were to die. The prophet's life symbolized Judah's destiny. Second, Jeremiah was not to mourn or lament the dead (v. 5), for God had removed His peace, love, and compassion from the community. All were to die without burial or lamentation. Nobody was to cut themselves or shave their heads (these mourning rituals, though prohibited in Israel, were practiced by the covenant violators; Deut. 14:1). The radical removal of all human interaction and compassion included the preclusion of giving bread or a comforting drink to the mourners (Jer. 16:7). Jeremiah was not to take part in eating and drinking at feasts. All joy of community life had broken down, even the loving and cheerful communication between bridegroom and bride (v. 9; cf. 7:34). This stern message was intended to lead Judah to rethink its way of life and return to the Lord.

In a didactic reflection on the painful prophesies, God anticipated the reaction of the people (16:2–9). They would ask why God had announced such disasters against them—they were not aware of their sin (i.e., of violating the covenant; v. 10). Jeremiah was to tell them that the transgressions of the fathers (idolatry) were heightened in Judah at this time because no one was listening to God (v. 11–12). The covenant required that Israel listen to and obey God's word (e.g., Deut. 6:1–9) and remain in Canaan. However, since they had broken the covenant, the people were sentenced to exile in a land they did not know and where they were to serve other gods, for the Lord would show them no favor (Jer. 16:13).

16:14–21. Message of Hope and Justice. The dark and depressing picture of the future (vv. 1–13) is unexpectedly interrupted and brightened by a message of hope. God described a new future for His people. He would repeat His miraculous deliverance of the Israelites from bondage in Egypt and bring the faithful back from all the lands where He had driven them to the promised land that had been given to their fathers (vv. 14–15). However, this promise did not weaken the force of the coming judgment. God would act through mysterious agents to trap the Judeans: the fishermen and the hunters (vv. 16–19). God's eyes could not ignore what they had done (cf. Heb. 4:13). Before restoration, God would first punish Judah for "defiling" His land with idols (16:18). The Exile is here seen as a "purification" of the Holy Land preceding the restoration.

The new age for God's people was to include the future submission of the nations (vv. 19–21). Seeing God's deliverance of His people and their restoration as a nation (vv. 14–15, 21), the nations would realize that they had inherited lies from their own ancestors. They would consider their own idols to be worthless and powerless (v. 19). God would show them His hand or might—that His name is the Lord (v. 21). Jeremiah here touches on an important biblical theme: God's purpose in calling Israel was to set them as "a light to the nations" (cf. Is. 2:2–4; 51:4; 60:1–3) so the nations would recognize Him as the only true God. This is the content of "the kingdom of God" celebrated in the temple service (Ps. 93–99). It remains God's plan through Christ (Matt. 28:18–20) and acquires central importance at the end of time (Rev. 14:6–20; 15:4; 21:1–4).

17:1–18

Judah's Sin and Punishment

Jeremiah addresses again the sin of Judah through a lawsuit speech (vv. 1–4), followed by instruction regarding curses and blessings (vv. 5–13). He concludes with a prayer for deliverance (vv. 14–18), which is his fourth Confession in the book (see Jeremiah: Introduction).

17:1–4. Lawsuit Speech. The Lord proclaimed Judah's undeniable guilt as written with an iron pen and engraved with the point of a diamond on their hearts and the horns of their altars (v. 1). The horns of the altar symbolized the blessing of forgiveness, but the sacrificial blood put there for atonement engraved the people's sin due to lack of repentance. The sins of Judah had not been removed from the heart of the people or from God's temple; they had not been forgiven. Judah's sin was idolatry, especially involving the fertility cult (v. 2; cf. 10:1–16), and without God's protection, an enemy would remove the wealth and treasures from Jerusalem (17:3–4; cf. 52:17–23). The land given by the Lord would be lost and replaced by captivity in a foreign land (cf. 16:13). These punishments were to be blamed on Judah, who kindled a fire in God's anger that would burn forever, an expression signifying the intensity of God's anger or the permanence of His judgment.

17:5–13. Blessings and Curses. The reference to the two ways in vv. 5–8 was influenced by Psalm 1. Trusting in humans brings the curse of death, but trusting in God brings the blessing of life. In the year of drought, the tree planted by the waters would yield fruit (cf. 14:1–18) because it stood on the source of life. The human heart is deceitful and incurable (i.e., unfaithful; cf. 17:5), but God, from whom nothing is hidden, makes us aware of our true condition (cf. 16:17). It is useless to trust in the power and wisdom of human beings who act independently of the Lord.

A proverbial illustration of sin warns against the unrighteous gain of riches (17:11). Economic deceit was a serious issue, committed both by individuals (cf. the unrighteous practice of usury in 15:10; cf. 9:3–8) and by the royal administration (i.e., abuse of authority, 22:13–17; cf. 1 Sam. 7:10–17). Those who unjustly gain riches are, according to some translations, like a partridge that broods but does not hatch, or, according to others, like a partridge which hatches eggs it has not laid. They would not retain what they did not own; they would be shown to be fools at the end (Jer. 17:11).

The prophet praises God's majestic power—illustrated by His glorious high throne in the Jerusalem sanctuary—and addresses Him as the hope of Israel (vv. 12–13). This forms the ground for Jeremiah's conclusion: all those who had forsaken God would be ashamed. The punishment corresponds with the sin. The sins of those who depart from God are written on the tablet of their hearts and the altars (v. 1); therefore, they would be written in the earth (or dust) (v. 13); that is, they would die because they had forsaken the fountain of living waters. Abandoning God is like being a shrub in the wilderness (i.e., there is no future for it), but trusting in Him is like being a tree planted by the waters (vv. 5–8).

17:14–18. Prayer for Deliverance. Jeremiah's prayer of deliverance is his fourth Confession. It balances the lawsuit in vv. 1–4, which foretold a harsh future. As an intercessor, Jeremiah did what was needed: he turned to God. His prayer resembles the psalms of lamentation, with ongoing shifts between motivations and petitions. Jeremiah prays for salvation, defined as healing from a disease. He had served God as a shepherd (vv. 14–16). He asks God, his hope in the day of judgment, not to terrorize him (v. 17). He prays for protection from his persecutors (cf. 15:10–21) and for their destruction (17:18) because of their mockery of the word of God (v. 15). Increasingly, Jeremiah contrasts the faithful, who are in need of God's mercy and deliverance, with the persecutors, who are deserving of judgment. This distinction implies that God would justly punish the unfaithful while mercifully restoring His faithful remnant.

17:19–27

Hallow the Sabbath Day

This section has a simple structure: an admonition to remember the Sabbath (vv. 21–22), followed by a warning against repeating the disobedience of Israel's fathers (v. 23). The people were reminded of the blessing that came from following the Sabbath command (vv. 24–26) and the curse that came from not following it (v. 27).

17:19–20. Leaders, People, and the Sabbath.

Jeremiah was sent by the Lord to stand in all the gates of Jerusalem, specifically where the kings of Judah went in and out, to deliver instruction regarding the Sabbath. The vital social dimension of the Sabbath made it necessary to involve the rulers. The Sabbath commandment is included in the Decalogue (Ex. 20:8–11; Deut. 5:12–15) and was considered a perpetual sign between God and Israel, reminding them that the Lord made them holy (Ex. 31:13; cf. Ex. 31:12–17). Its importance in Judah is supported by an inscription on an ostrakon (a potsherd used for writing) from Jeremiah's time, in which the writer complains that as he was finishing the reaping before the Sabbath, his garment was taken as a pledge for a debt; he was asking for its return according to the law (Ex. 22:25–27).

17:21–27. Remember the Sabbath. According to vv. 21–22, Sabbath observance consists of not doing any work. This is illustrated by the admonition not to carry burdens into Jerusalem to be sold on the Sabbath. The Sabbath was to be a day of rest and was set apart as sacred. Hallowing and resting on the Sabbath acknowledges God as the Creator of the world (Ex. 20:11) and as the Deliverer of Israel from bondage in Egypt (Deut. 5:15). Faithfully keeping the Sabbath represents covenant observance. It is singled out for its special significance as a covenant sign. Obedience to this command would ensure that descendants of David would walk through the gates to sit on the throne of David and that the leaders of the people would come to Jerusalem to offer sacrifices to the Lord (Jer. 17:24–26). If the Sabbath were desecrated, then the Lord would kindle a fire in the gates that would devour the palace and the city (vv. 27). The future of the city was directly connected to Sabbath observance.

18:1–23

The Potter and the Clay

The chapter opens with a symbolic action (vv. 1–4) and its application to the people (vv. 5–11). It continues with the rejection of the divine warning (vv. 12–17) and the persecution of Jeremiah (vv. 18–23).

18:1–17. Symbolic Action and Application.

God commanded Jeremiah to visit the potter's house where he would receive His words. Jeremiah observed the potter's complete control of the clay, shaping and reshaping it in any form he wanted. Similarly, God could do with Israel as the potter did with the clay (cf. Is. 45:9–11), for He is the Sovereign Lord and Israel is His servant. The potter and the clay illustrate God's sovereignty and Israel's duty. Israel was in the hands of the Lord and was expected to submit to the will of the Lord in order for Him to accomplish His loving intentions for the people. In view of the impending judgment, God asked Judah and Jerusalem to turn/return from their evil ways and to make their doings good (Jer. 18:11).

But the people decided that they would not change (v. 12). This reaction on their part was the reason for the judgment speech immediately following (vv. 13–17). Three rhetorical questions were put to the nations as witnesses of the legal proceedings. The essential question was “Who has heard of a nation making the choices that Israel has made?” (vv. 13–14). The symbolism of water in v. 14 refers to the Lord as the water of life for Israel (2:13, 18; 17:13). What Judah had done went against common sense. God’s people had forgotten their Life-Giver and resorted to idolatry (18:15a). Therefore, they had brought judgment upon themselves (vv. 15b–16). God would scatter them and show them no favor (v. 17).

18:18–23. Oppression of Jeremiah. The Judeans, who listened only to their own evil hearts (v. 12), conspired against Jeremiah and his prophecies (v. 18). They made plans to take him to court and charge him with insurrection (cf. 26:8–11). They defended their priests, sages, and false prophets but opposed the word of God from Jeremiah. The divine action (18:1–17) is compared to what Jeremiah’s enemies would do to him in their resistance to God’s word (v. 18). In his fifth Confession, Jeremiah appeals to God’s righteousness (vv. 18–23) in not allowing the innocent to be punished (cf. 11:18–23; 12:1–4; 15:10–12, 15–21; 17:14–18; 20:7–18).

Turning to the Lord in prayer (18:19–23), Jeremiah asks for Him to pay attention to his opponents’ plans. He appeals to God’s sense of justice when asking whether good should be repaid with evil. The people planned to kill Jeremiah, while he was interceding on their behalf for God’s wrath to be turned away (v. 20; cf. vv. 22b–23a). The unit ends with several petitions similar to the imprecatory psalms (see “Imprecatory Passages in the Psalms,” p. 733) regarding the removal and punishment of adversaries opposed not only to Jeremiah but also to God Himself (Jer. 18:21–23). It should be noted that Jeremiah left vengeance in God’s hands—as did the psalmists—and did not unilaterally seek vengeance. In addition, as Jeremiah mentions, he had been pleading for the people, and his decision to cease praying for them was in obedience to God’s admonition to stop praying on their behalf (cf. 7:16; 11:14; 14:11). Besides, his imprecations were consonant with what God had already decreed. The Confession in 18:18–23 illustrates the irreconcilable conflict between unfaithful Israel and God, between the Judean establishment and Jeremiah, between the lies of false teachers and the truth of God’s word. It argues not only for God’s judgment but also for deliverance from evil and death, opening up the possibility for God’s salvation of His remnant (chaps. 30–33).

19:1–15

The Sign of the Broken Flask

God announced the coming judgment (vv. 1–3) and offered evidence to justify His decision (vv. 4–9; the breaking of the flask illustrated the future of Judah [vv. 10–15]).

19:1–9. Announcing the Judgment and Punishment. Jeremiah was commanded to procure a clay water bottle (vv. 10–12) and take some elders as witnesses to the Valley of Hinnom, near the Potsherd Gate in Jerusalem (where broken pottery was thrown away). There he was to address the kings and people of Judah and Jerusalem. The first part of Jeremiah’s prophecy imitates the lawsuit form and contains three units arranged as an inclusio (vv. 3–9):

- A Punishment (v. 3)
- B Indictment (vv. 4–6)
- A' Punishment (vv. 7–9)

The coming destruction would be so terrible that all who heard of it would be stunned and shocked (v. 3; cf. Deut. 28:37).

The indictment sought to provide the needed evidence to justify the coming judgment. The evidence indicated that the people had abandoned God and treated Jerusalem as a place for foreign gods (Jer. 19:4–5). They had burned incense in Jerusalem to these gods whom neither they, their fathers, nor the kings of Judah had ever known, and they had filled their land with the blood of innocent people. God emphasized how these defiling acts had impacted Jerusalem. The place where Jeremiah delivered his prophecy intentionally oscillates between the shameful Valley of Hinnom, Tophet, and the city gate. Jerusalem had become foreign to the Lord. The blood of the innocent was associated with the high places of Baal (Tophet) where they sacrificed their children as burnt offerings (v. 5). God had never intended for this to happen.

In response, God would avenge the acts of apostasy (vv. 6–9). Those who broke the covenant by slaughtering their innocent children as sacrifices to alien gods would be slaughtered by an alien army, and the name of Tophet and the Valley of Hinnom would be changed to the Valley of Slaughter (v. 6). God’s judgment is expressed by a series of verbs rooted in the covenant curses (vv. 6–9; Deut. 28:15–68). Being righteous, He was obliged to be faithful to the stipulated curses for a broken covenant.

Even the horrific sacrifice of their innocent children to Baal (Jer. 19:6) would be avenged by the desperate act of parents eating the flesh of their children (v. 9; cf. Deut. 28:53–57).

19:10–15. The Flask and the Future. Jeremiah's symbolic act of breaking the flask (v. 10) meant that God would permanently destroy the city (v. 11). In this case, the principle of justice demands retribution: the houses in Jerusalem would be defiled like Tophet, just as the people had defiled their houses by burning incense to all the host of heaven and pouring out drink offerings to other gods (vv. 12–13). Through the prediction of this judgment, God intended to bring Jerusalem to repentance. However, in a concluding scene, Jeremiah moved to the court of the temple and announced God's word to all the people. Since they had proudly and stubbornly refused to hear His words, the Lord of Hosts would surely execute the judgment (vv. 14–15).

20:1–18

Jeremiah Persecuted

This section deals with Jeremiah's struggle with his prophetic calling in the face of persecution. After recounting his confrontation with Pashhur (vv. 1–6), he describes his unpopular ministry (vv. 7–18). The reference to Babylon (vv. 4–6) suggests a date after 605 B.C., when the Babylonians defeated Egypt at Carchemish.

20:1–6. The Word of God to Pashhur. Pashhur the son of Immer, a priest and chief governor in the temple, sought to silence Jeremiah by beating him and putting him in the stocks. In response, Jeremiah delivered a prophecy linking Pashhur's fate with that of Jerusalem (vv. 3–6) and declared that the Lord had renamed him Magor-Missabib, "terror all around." This symbolic naming is linked to the first prediction in Jeremiah concerning the Babylonian disaster (vv. 4–6). The message embedded in the name was that the temple, associated with peace, would in reality bring terror.

God would make Pashhur a terror to himself and all his friends—he would see them fall by the sword. God would also give Babylon all the wealth of Jerusalem (v. 5). Pashhur and his household would be exiled to Babylon, where he would die and be buried. The reason for this punishment was that Pashhur had prophesied lies (v. 6). By falsifying the covenant law, he had made himself an agent of deception.

20:7–18. Jeremiah's Unpopular Ministry.

This unit contains Jeremiah's sixth and last Confession (see Jeremiah: Introduction). Jeremiah's prayer opens with a powerful lamentation (vv. 7–10). He claims that God, at the moment of his call, persuaded (patah, "persuaded," "seduced," "enticed," or "deceived") him with wonderful promises (v. 7; cf. v. 10). God overpowered Him. The language appears to be that of a man seducing a woman and finally forcing himself on her. Jeremiah was not able to reject his call. After the sweet moment of the divine call, Jeremiah faced the reality of a complex and difficult ministry and the hostility of the people (v. 8). Even if he wished to remain silent in order to avoid the hostility, he could not do so because the word of God was like a fire in his bones (v. 9). His oppressors mocked him, and his friends or acquaintances (lit. "all men of my peace," i.e., "all who wish me well") were trying to make him fall so that they could take their revenge on him (v. 10; cf. v. 7). This is about the cost of being God's servant at a time when God's warning of judgment against Judah was severe, though the people appeared to be enjoying peace and prosperity.

Jeremiah put his trust in God (vv. 11–12). Though his enemies attempted to make him stumble, God would make them stumble. He pleaded with God to act in his favor—the mighty, awesome One who examines the righteous. As for the conspirators, their infamy would never be forgotten. Jeremiah asked to witness God's vengeance on the persecutors who were plotting vengeance against him (vv. 10, 12). As a servant of God, Jeremiah did not take revenge into his own hands, but he asked God to act according to His will. The tone changes in v. 13, when Jeremiah offers praise to God for His salvation. The lament prayer leads to praising God for the coming deliverance (v. 13). God's favorable answer had either been given or Jeremiah knew that God would answer in the future, so he praised Him.

Surprisingly, another profound lament follows in vv. 14–18. Jeremiah seems to have moved in a circle, always coming back to the comfort of God's care but also returning to his own suffering and lamentation. The crude reality of prophetic service is that it often generates ongoing pain for the prophet, while the faith of the prophet generates ongoing comfort for the people. The lament has no explicit addressee but seems to be a personal reflection. The speaker curses the day he was born because life has brought labor and sorrow and shame (vv. 14, 18; cf. Job 3).

The lament in vv. 14–18 expresses not only Jeremiah's sense of hopelessness (v. 18) but also the hopelessness of God's people experiencing destruction and exile. This mingling of individual and collective speakers is common in some biblical texts (e.g., in the book of Psalms) and indicates that the intercessor may be identifying himself or herself with the suffering people. Jeremiah also shows a fondness for transforming a current situation into a symbol of the future situation of the people (e.g., Pashhur in 20:1–6). Thus, Jeremiah expresses his own despair in the text, but in a way his words also express his people's despair and shame after the predicted devastating judgment. His prayer for salvation from his persecutors becomes a prayer for the salvation of God's people under the hopelessness brought by the judgment (cf. 11:18–23; 12:1–6; 15:10–21; 17:14–18; 18:18–23). This theme points forward to the promise of hope and a new future (e.g., chaps. 23–25, 30–33).

21:1–25:38

Judgment and Hope

The content of this section is characterized by judgment against Judah (21:1–23:40) and is interrupted by a messianic prophesy (23:1–8), a powerful central statement of hope (24:1–10), and judgment against Babylon and the nations (25:1–38).

21:1–14. Message to King Zedekiah and Judah. Jerusalem had been left enfeebled and fearful by the Babylonian invasion in 598 B.C., when Zedekiah was on the throne. The troubled king sent servants to Jeremiah to inquire of the Lord for them. The initial question (vv. 1–2) has four answers (vv. 3–7, 8–10, 11–12, 13–14). The question aimed at averting the approaching Babylonian threat but is expressed as a wish. Zedekiah wanted to ascertain whether he could still rely on God's faithfulness in the new crisis. But he only asked because he lacked faith.

God's first answer through Jeremiah was not what the king wished to hear (vv. 3–7). Allusions are made to the Exodus (vv. 4–7; cf. Deut. 26:8; Ps. 136:12), indicating that God remained the same. But the shocking surprise was that He was now acting against Judah and in favor of Babylon. The king and all his people would be given to the Babylonians. There was no hope for Judah because of God's intense anger (Jer. 21:5).

Jeremiah's second answer addressed the people (vv. 8–10). God set before them the ways of life and death (see Deut. 30:15–20). The way of death would be in trusting the king, his army, and Jerusalem's walls (i.e., to stay in the city and experience the sword, famine, and plague; v. 9a). The way of life and hope would be to escape from the city and defect to the Babylonians because the judgment would target the royal establishment and the temple. Surrender would be the prophet's way of survival. It may mean exile, but lives would be saved, and God might bring His faithful people back.

The third answer addressed the royal house (vv. 11–12). The evil of their past deeds was clear, but there was hope if they would change their ruling practice. The way out is expressed by imperatives to always be just and to rescue victims. This is based on the covenant duty and on what God Himself does (e.g., Ex. 22:22; Deut. 10:18; 24:14, 17–18; 27:19; cf. Jer. 22:1–30; 49:11). Jeremiah's fourth answer (vv. 13–14) addressed the self-sufficiency of people boasting that there was hardly any threat from the Babylonians. He announced that God would punish these people by fire because of their contempt for the covenant and the prophetic word.

22:1–30. Indictments of the Royal House. Jeremiah addressed the Davidic house (vv. 1–9) and the failure of the monarchy (vv. 10–30). If the king would execute justice and righteousness, safeguarding the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow, and would not shed innocent blood, then the monarchy would remain (vv. 3–9; cf. 7:5–7). But because the king did not listen to/obey, the royal house would collapse. The main concern is obedience to the covenant laws protecting the innocent and the needy (see e.g., Ex. 22:22; Deut. 10:18; 24:17; 27:19). The Davidic house was precious to God but so also was caring for the poor in accordance with the covenant (Jer. 22:16c–17).

The failure of the monarchy is addressed in vv. 10–30. It opens with an invitation to lament for the one going into exile never to return. The text then identifies the exiled as King Jehoahaz ("Shallum"), who was taken captive to Egypt, where he died (vv. 11–12; cf. 2 Kin. 23:30–34). This is followed by an indictment against the self-seeking interests of the kings (Jer. 22:13–30), illustrated by King Jehoiakim. The principles of a just ruler are outlined in vv. 13–17, and Jehoiakim's father, King Josiah, appears as an example (vv. 15–16). The basic tenet is that "knowing God" means to act justly toward the poor and needy (v. 16). But Jehoiakim is characterized in the text by covetousness, the shedding of innocent blood, and oppression and violence

(v. 17; cf. 13–14). This indictment is followed by a judgment speech (vv. 18–23). Jehoiakim's death would not be lamented, and his burial would be dishonorable (vv. 18–19). The foreign gods ("your lovers") would be destroyed (v. 20). Verse 21 is a reminder of the refusal of the king to listen to/obey God's voice. The unit concludes with a description of the shame and humiliation of the king that the judgment would bring (vv. 22–23). The leaders of God's people are expected to set aside self-interest in order to serve the people and care for those in need.

God then turned to "Coniah," also known as King Jehoiachin (598–597 B.C.). Although the king was "the signet of His right hand," God would now pull him off. Jehoiachin would be handed over to the king of Babylon and taken to exile with his mother and descendants—they all would die there (vv. 24–27). God then declared to the whole earth that the current royal house would no longer rule in Judah (vv. 26–30). This vacuum on the throne is dealt with in 23:1–8.

23:1–8. The Branch of Righteousness. The general indictment against the kings in vv. 1–2 is followed by three promises to the remnant (vv. 3–8). First, God would gather His people from all the countries where He had driven them, bring them back, and make them fruitful (v. 3). The scattering of the flock was the result of the unfaithful shepherds who did not attend to it (cf. Mark 6:34). God would, however, intervene and bring the remnant back to the land. He would set rulers over them who would show His care for them, and they would no longer be afraid (Jer. 23:4; cf. Ezek. 34:1–31).

Second, God promised the coming of the Messiah. In fulfillment of His covenant with David, God would raise a righteous Branch (i.e., a Son of David in the "tree" of David's house), a King who would reign and prosper, executing justice and righteousness on earth (cf. Is. 11:1–16). He would bring peace and reunite Judah and Israel. His name would be the Lord our Righteousness (Jer. 23:5–6), a possible play on the name Zedekiah (21:1–14), which means "the Lord is righteous." Unlike Zedekiah, the Messiah would practice God's righteousness (v. 12; 22:3), and His rule was to bring well-being to all through justice for the poor and needy.

Third, God promised a new exodus for God's people, a return from exile (23:7–8). The return was fulfilled by the command of the Persian king Cyrus in 537 B.C., but the kingdom was not restored. However, the successive foreign domination by Persia, Greece, and Rome kept alive the hope for a coming Messiah. When Jesus of Nazareth announced "the kingdom of God" and that God's people needed to "repent" (Matt. 4:17), Israel still lived in expectation of the Messiah (see e.g. Luke 2:25–37).

23:9–40. False Prophets and Empty Oracles.

Jeremiah ministered in the midst of competing claims to "truth," each professing to be a revelation of God's will. In this unit, he makes his clearest argument for the truthfulness of his prophetic words. In the first part (vv. 9–22), Jeremiah brings a general indictment against the religious leaders (i.e., prophets and priests). He expresses a deep inner turmoil as he contrasts the Lord's holy words with the unfaithful words and deeds covering the land, causing it to 'abal, which can mean "mourn" or "dry up," under a curse (vv. 9–10). The profanity and wickedness practiced in the temple by both prophets and priests would be punished (vv. 11–12).

God indicted the false prophets in Samaria (Israel) and Jerusalem (Judah; vv. 13–15). They prophesied in the name of Baal and led God's people into error; they were committing adultery and practicing deception (lit. "walking in lies"). In Jerusalem, they supported the evildoers rather than calling people to turn from their wickedness. God had therefore rejected them as He had Sodom and Gomorrah and would punish them (cf. v. 15 and 9:15). As the Ruler of the world, God had laid plans and had made decisions in the council (or counsel—the Hebrew word can mean either) of His heavenly court (23:18). When a decision had been made, a messenger or a prophet was commissioned to announce it (e.g. 1 Kin. 22:19–23; Is. 6:6–8). God firmly stated that He had not sent or spoken to the false prophets (Jer. 23:21). They did not stand in God's council. If they had, as was the case with a true prophet such as Jeremiah, they would have announced God's words to His people to help them turn from their evil ways (v. 22). Unlike a false prophet, a true prophet would have led the people to faithfulness to God.

The critique of false prophets continues in vv. 23–32. God asserted His sovereignty, declaring that He would not be controlled or manipulated by humans. He is supreme, and before Him all humans must bow. God cannot be drawn into human schemes and political agendas. He could be near to His people and also distant from them. Yet He could not be avoided because He sees all and fills heaven and earth. With this in mind, God turned again to the false prophets.

Having dreams (v. 25) was no proof of divine authority. What mattered was the turning of the people to God through their messages (vv. 25-27, 30-32).

In vv. 28-29, the text provides a comparison between true and false prophets, where dreams are contrasted with God's word, like chaff and wheat. The criterion for true prophecy lies in the nature of God's word: it is like a fire and a powerful hammer that breaks rocks in pieces. Thus, the word has great power, and nothing can hinder its implementation (cf. Deut. 18:15-22; Is. 55:10-11).

God rejected the false prophets on four grounds (vv. 30-32): (a) they were stealing God's words from their neighbors (v. 30)—they were claiming for themselves others' alleged revelations (perhaps words of other genuine prophets or of other false prophets); (b) they were quoting God although He had not spoken to them (v. 31); (c) they were prophesying false dreams (v. 32a); and (d) they were causing God's people to err by their lies (v. 32b). Their uselessness to the people was based on the fact that God had not sent them (v. 32c).

The last unit (vv. 33-40) is built on a play on the word massa', which is difficult to translate. It derives from the verb nasa' ("bear," "lift") and can mean both "that which one bears" (i.e., "burden") and "that for which one raises one's voice" (i.e., "utterance"). A prophetic utterance would be an "oracle," "message," or "prophecy." The key to the meaning of the passage is the identification of the words of the false prophets as their own words—a perversion of God's words (v. 36; cf. vv. 25-27, 30-32). Therefore, God forbade them from claiming the massa' ("the message," "utterance") of the Lord (six times in vv. 33-34, 36, 38). His name was not to be attached to their false prophecies. People could ask about the Lord's "burden"/"message"/"oracle" but were not to presume to know it (vv. 35-38). Such false assumptions would result in closing oneself off from the true knowledge of God's omniscience, omnipresence, and sovereignty (cf. vv. 23-24) and in being cast out into exile (v. 39). Thus, the religious leadership in Judah was accused of attempting to control God's actions through knowledge that they did not have. This is a serious matter that even Christian leaders need to recognize.

24:1-10. Two Baskets of Figs. God showed Jeremiah two baskets with figs that had been placed in front of the temple. One had good figs, but the figs in the other were so ruined that they could not be eaten (vv. 1-2). Through this image, God revealed His plan for the faithful remnant in Babylon (i.e., the good figs) and His plan for the unfaithful people in Judah and Egypt (i.e., the bad figs). The judgment against the royal establishment in Judah included exile or death. God would send the sword, famine, and plague against them until they were consumed (vv. 8-10). The promise of hope to the faithful remnant in exile included the return to their homeland (vv. 4-7). Language found in Jeremiah's call (1:10) is used to describe their experience: God would build them up and plant them (24:6). The new covenant would be based on what God would do: He would give His people a heart to know Him, and when they returned to Him, a new covenant would be made (v. 7; cf. chaps. 30-33).

25:1-14. Seventy Years of Desolation. This unit dates to the first year of Nebuchadnezzar (605 B.C.). Babylon has now entered the scene as a new world power, becoming a threat to Judah. But God will limit Babylon's dominion to seventy years. This knowledge is central to Jeremiah, for it underscores that God is sovereign, even over Babylon, and that the possibility of Israel's return and restoration is kept open. Jeremiah accused Judah and Jerusalem of refusing to listen to God's word as given through His prophets. This had been the case not only during his own twenty-three years of ministry but also in the prophetic movement through which God had led His people for centuries (vv. 3-7). In v. 4, the Hebrew verb shakam (lit. "rising early") conveys the idea of "repeatedly" (see commentary on 7:13 and Jeremiah: Introduction). All of God's prophets called Israel to repentance with instructions on right conduct, warnings against apostasy provoking God's anger, and assurances of God's protection. But the people refused to hear (obey), and the Lord's anger was provoked to their own detriment (25:5-7). This is an excellent summary of Jeremiah's prophecies from chapters 2-25.

God then announced that because of their refusal to hear/obey, He would send His servant Nebuchadnezzar against Judah and the nations all around, resulting in their destruction (25:8-9). The life and joy of the community would disappear (v. 10; cf. 7:34; 16:9; 33:11). The land of Judah and its neighbors was to become desolate, and they would serve the king of Babylon seventy years (v. 11). After that, God would punish Babylon for its iniquity and make it a perpetual desolation (v. 12; cf. 50:1-51:58). Judah's liberation after seventy years came in 536 B.C. (606/5–537/6 B.C.), when the Persian king Cyrus allowed the exiles to return home. The message is that God is the Sovereign Lord of all the nations. He gives and takes away their life and dominion (1:10; cf. 18:9; 24:6; 31:28; 32:41; 42:10). God rules supreme, and His kingdom is everlasting. Therefore, despite the judgment, there is hope for God's people.

25:15–38. Judgment on the Nations. This unit announces God's judgment upon all the nations of the earth, including Judah and Babylon. His judgment on Babylon was what made the restoration of Israel possible (23:1–8; 30:1–33:28). The unit integrates two concepts: (a) God “ordained [Jeremiah] a prophet to the nations” (1:5) and “set [him] over the nations and over the kingdoms” (v. 9); and (b) the Lord is the Sovereign God and universal Ruler of the nations, and no kingdom or nation could endure His fierce anger (25:30–31, 38). The first part of the judgment outlines Jeremiah's ministry in symbolic terms (vv. 15–29). God commanded the prophet to take the cup of the wine of His fury from His hand (i.e., God's anger expressed in His word of judgment) and to cause all the nations to whom he was sent to drink it (i.e., proclaim to them God's word of judgment), with the result that they would drink, stagger, and go mad because of the sword that God would send among them (i.e., fear and chaos would rule from the day of their hearing the word until its fulfillment). The wine cup of fury is a common biblical metaphor for God's anger, which brings judgment and causes its recipients to stagger and lose control, resulting in fear and chaos (cf. Is. 51:17–22; Jer. 49:12; 51:7; Lam. 4:21; Ezek. 23:31–34; Hab. 2:15–16; Obad. 15; Zech. 12:2). Jeremiah communicated God's word to a range of nations, beginning with Judah and ending with Babylon (transliterated as “Sheshak” or “Sheshach, Jer. 25:17–26; cf. 46:1–51:58). But there is also an emphasis on all the kingdoms of the earth (25:26; cf. vv. 15, 17), linked with God's plan to bring calamity on all people (45:4–5; cf. 25:31) and which may be associated with a universal day of judgment when God's judgment, depicted by the metaphor of the sword, would fall on all the earth (v. 29).

According to vv. 30–38, God would come to hold judgment on the earth—He would bring a “lawsuit” (rib) against the nations (v. 31), rulers, and kings. This resembles the Day of the Lord, when God would deal with the nations and establish justice and peace (e.g., Is. 2–4; 13:6, 9; 34:8; Jer. 46:10; Ezek. 7:19; 13:5; Joel 1:15; 2:1, 11; 3:14; Amos 5:18; Obad. 15; Zeph. 1:7; Zech.

14:1; Mal. 3:23). The cause for the judgment is not clearly stated, except in Judah's case and in general reference to the wicked (Jer. 25:31). The message has more to do with God's sovereignty over the nations than with their behavior and fate. Its purpose was to strengthen Israel's faith in God as Babylon was rising to power (v. 1) and to explain why the prediction of a limit of seventy years for Babylon's dominion (vv. 3–14) was indeed to be trusted. The section closes affirming that none of the nations on earth is autonomous—they are all accountable to God.

26:1–29:32

CONFRONTATIONS WITH PRIESTS AND PROPHETS

These units cover the time of Jehoiakim's early reign (609–598 B.C.) to the reign of Zedekiah (597–586 B.C.). The chapters have been placed together between chapters 2–25 and 30–33 because of the common theme of the two perspectives on Judah's fate. On the one hand, there was the official view that Jerusalem was safe and its survival from the threat of Babylon was guaranteed by God's promises. On the other hand was the opposite view from God that Jerusalem had no guarantees of survival because the Babylonian threat was His punishment for widespread apostasy and the violation of the covenant.

26:1–24

Jeremiah Saved from Death

In this section of Jeremiah, we gain new insights into the various reactions to his sermon in the temple, recorded in chapter 7 and summarized here. In this particular case, the narrative focuses on the prophet's credibility. Was his prophetic word trustworthy? Knowing that this was going to be the heart of the debate, the Lord informed Jeremiah that He had sent the same message of judgment against the city and the temple through other prophets before him (vv. 4–6). In other words, his prophecy was in agreement with that of previous prophets.

The reaction of those who listened to Jeremiah varied. The false prophets and the priests immediately condemned Jeremiah because, based on their false sense of security, they assumed that the temple and the city would never be destroyed (vv. 7–9). Therefore, based on their preconceived ideas, Jeremiah could not be a true prophet of the Lord. Their intention was to kill Jeremiah for pronouncing judgment against the temple and the city. Years later, similar charges would be raised against Jesus (Matt. 27:61) and Stephen (Acts 6:13–14). Jeremiah knew that everything depended on the people's acceptance of his prophetic ministry. After the arrival of the princes of Judah, he proclaimed once more his message and reaffirmed that he was a true prophet of the Lord (Jer. 26:14).

The elders decided to compare the message of Jeremiah with that of previous prophets (vv. 18–28). They tested his prophetic claim. They demonstrated that there was continuity between what Jeremiah was proclaiming and the messages of judgment against the city and the temple announced by the prophets Micah and Urijah. King Hezekiah had listened to Micah, but King Jehoiakim had killed Urijah. The implicit question was whether they should react like Hezekiah or like Jehoiakim. For the moment, the continuity of Jeremiah's message with that of previous prophets indicated that he was a true prophet. The fact that the life of the prophet was preserved particularly through the intervention of Ahikam (v. 29), a supporter of Josiah's reform, suggests that the enemies of Jeremiah had not been persuaded.

This unit (vv. 1–24) also places Jeremiah within a spiritual movement in Judah that maintained the covenant—here supported by the elders of the land (vv. 16–19) and prophets like Urijah (vv. 20–23). They were in conflict with the ideology of the royal establishment that compromised the covenant by self-seeking and fertility cults. This mixed audience of the faithful and apostates explains the contrary themes of judgment and hope in Jeremiah's prophecies.

27:1–22

Symbol of the Bonds and Yokes

The purpose of the section is to show that God appointed Babylon as His servant to execute His judgment and that lives would be preserved only in submission to the Babylonians. God issued three decrees: to Judah's neighboring nations, to King Zedekiah, and to Judah and Jerusalem. God commanded Jeremiah to make a yoke of straps and bars and to put it on his neck as a symbol of Babylonian domination (v. 2; cf. 28:1–11). Envoys arriving at the Jerusalem court would take these symbols and a decree from God to the kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Sidon (27:3). The first decree has five statements (vv. 4–11): (a) God had made the world and given it to whom He deemed proper (v. 5; cf. Acts 17:24–27); (b) He had given both the land and beasts of Judah's neighboring nations to His servant, the king of Babylon (v. 6); (c) He would limit Babylon's dominion until the time of judgment against his land would come—when the nations would make Babylon serve them (v. 7; cf. the limit of the seventy years in 25:11–14); (d) therefore, God put a choice before Judah's neighbors: resisting the Babylonians would mean annihilation by the sword, famine, or pestilence (27:8), but submitting to the Babylonians and accepting their yoke would allow the Israelites to remain in their land (v. 11); and (e) the recipients were to reject the lies of the false prophets (diviners, dreamers, soothsayers, or sorcerers) advising them, for shortsighted personal gain, not to serve the Babylonians. Such false prophecies would result in exile (v. 9).

The second decree was to Zedekiah and repeated the choice offered to the kings of the neighboring nations (vv. 12–15). The third decree (vv. 16–22) was to Judah and Jerusalem. It emphasized that life and hope were connected with God's words through Jeremiah. However, a particular issue was raised. The false prophets had lied, saying that the temple vessels already taken to Babylon (597 B.C.) would be brought back shortly (v. 16). God told them that this would not be the case and that even the vessels remaining in Jerusalem would be carried to Babylon and would remain there until God's restoration of His people to Jerusalem (vv. 18–22). With irony, Jeremiah invited the false prophets to pray to God that the remaining vessels not be taken by Babylon (v. 18), which would only happen if Judah would repent and return to the Lord.

28:1–17

Hananiah's Falsehood and Doom

Hananiah appeared, claiming to be sent by the Lord (vv. 1–4). His name means "the Lord is gracious," and he asserted that God was indeed more gracious than Jeremiah's harsh judgments suggested. He confronted Jeremiah in the presence of the priests and all the people with a supposed word from the Lord (vv. 2–4). Opposing Jeremiah's message in 27:16–22, he announced that God had broken Babylon's yoke, and within two years the temple vessels and Jehoiachin ("Jeconiah"), together with other exiles, would return. Hananiah twisted the covenant promises and ignored the fact that God's promises of protection had been made void by Judah's disobedience.

Though wishing that Hananiah's prophecy were true (28:6; cf. 27:18), Jeremiah changes the topic and makes prophetic authority the central issue. Because God's prophets in the past protected the covenant, they were called to prophesy war and disaster and plagues against many nations (28:8). Their messages concerned God's covenant, not politics, and their indictments against Israel therefore resulted in judgment. Hananiah's words of peace and well-being could be tested (v. 9; cf. 6:14; 8:11). Jeremiah appealed to the covenant (Deut. 18:22), insisting that a fulfilled prophecy proved that such a messenger was one whom the Lord had truly sent. The burden of proof was on Hananiah. Only time would tell. But what if Hananiah were wrong? Did not the deportation in 597 B.C. indicate Babylon's power and intentions to rule over Judah?

Hananiah confidently broke the wooden yoke (cf. 27:2), restating his prophecy that, within two years, God would break the Babylonian dominion (28:10–11). Jeremiah withdrew from the debate. God later instructed him to tell Hananiah that he had broken the yokes of wood, but in the process, he had created unbreakable yokes of iron! The judgment, rather than being averted, would be intensified: God would put yokes of iron on all of the nations, forcing them to serve Babylon (vv. 12–14). The point is that Hananiah's prophecy was false, and he was a deceiver, not sent by the Lord. In order to show that Jeremiah was a true prophet, God announced the death of Hananiah. He died that same year, in the seventh month, because he had spoken rebellion against the Lord (vv. 15–17). The fulfillment of Jeremiah's short-term prophecy demonstrated that he was a true prophet and that, consequently, his other prophecies would be also fulfilled. He had passed another prophetic test. Hananiah's error was his unfaithfulness to the covenant and the word of God.

This episode illustrates the repeated instruction in 27:9–10 and 14–18 to reject the false prophets. But the confrontation goes deeper; it is about who God is. As Israel's God of the covenant, Yahweh loved His people and was righteous (i.e., He was faithful to Israel, as defined by the covenant, and true to His word). However, He is also the holy and powerful Sovereign Lord of the nations, who plucks up and tears down, who builds and plants (cf. 1:10). Israel's destiny, therefore, depended on their faithfulness to God.

29:1–32

Jeremiah's Letter to the Captives

Jeremiah sent a letter to the captives in Babylon through two royal messengers of King Zedekiah who had access to the court of King Nebuchadnezzar (vv. 1–3). The content confirmed the existence of at least two groups in Babylon: defectors and keepers of the covenant. The disobedient defenders of the royal establishment who trusted in the false prophets, all of whom would be punished, were admonished to repent. God's faithful remnant people, who would survive in exile and eventually be brought home, were encouraged to be patient and faithful (cf. chaps. 23–28). In the meantime, the remnant were required to (1) realistically accept the Exile as the setting where they were now required to live and where God had called them to obedience (29:5–7) and (2) continue to hope/wait for their return and restoration (vv. 10–14).

The passage (vv. 4–28) is framed by a repetition of the main admonition of hope given by God: to build houses, live in them, plant gardens, and eat their produce (vv. 5, 28). This is the letter's key pastoral advice. Another important theme is the warning against false prophets (vv. 8–9, 21–32; cf. chaps. 24–28). The most poignant part of the letter is found in 29:5–7. God's people in exile were to build and plant (cf. 1:10), to marry and have children, and to let their children marry. The promise to Abraham of a large offspring remained in place, even in Babylon. They were even to seek peace for Babylon because peace for the city would mean peace for the exiles (29:7). The purpose was to assure God's remnant of hope and a future with Him (v. 11).

Attention was given to the hope of a return from exile by reference to the seventy years (cf. 25:11–12) and God's good promise (lit. "word") for them (29:10–14). This assurance was based on God's inner thoughts toward His people: plans for peace, not harm, a future and hope i.e., hopeful future). God's plan was based on His love for Israel and His desire for communion with them. Israel would search for Him with all their heart, and they would find Him (vv. 12–14a). Then God would bring His scattered people back to the promised land.

The letter is filled with warnings against false prophets. Besides the prophets in Judah (see chaps. 23–28), there were prophets in Babylon among the exiles (29:1, 8, 15). Jeremiah deals with them in vv. 15–19, 20–23, and 24–32, particularly attacking an opponent in Babylon named Shemaiah the Nehelamite (vv. 24–28). In a letter, Shemaiah had urged Zephaniah, the priest in Jerusalem, to take advantage of his temple office and suppress any false prophets (v. 26). Shemaiah reproached Zephaniah for not having rebuked Jeremiah for prophesying that the captivity would last a long time, and that accordingly the exiles should build houses, live in them, plant gardens, and eat their produce (v. 28). Hearing what Shemaiah had said, Jeremiah sent a letter back to the community in Babylon, warning that Shemaiah was not sent by the Lord but had caused the people to trust in a lie and had taught rebellion against the Lord (vv. 31–32). Therefore, none of his family would return from the Exile.

30:1—33:26

BOOK OF COMFORT

God commanded Jeremiah to write in a book all the words He had spoken to him (v. 2). This included the assurance that Israel would repossess the land promised to their fathers. Based on the introduction (30:1–4) and the common theme of restoration, chapters 30–33 may be understood to be a single unit called “the Book of Comfort.” As we have seen, both judgment and hope were part of God’s plan to restore the covenant with Israel (cf. 16:14–21; 23:1–8; 24:1—25:14; 27:7, 11; 29:1–14). In this plan, judgment (destruction) and hope (reconstruction) grew out of God’s will to create a new beginning (cf. v. 11). His desire to restore Israel was rooted in His character: (a) His faithfulness to His people, His promise, His honor, and His mission; (b) His power as Ruler of the nations; and (c) His forgiveness of Israel’s moral and spiritual corruption. The substance of the Book of Comfort, therefore, is God’s faithfulness, His power to liberate from oppression, and His compassionate forgiveness.

30:1–24

Restoration of Israel and Judah

This chapter can be divided into three units: assurance of salvation (vv. 1–11), judgment as correction (vv. 12–17), and covenant renewal (vv. 18–24).

30:1–11. God Will Save Jacob. The listener was first invited into a situation of fear and unrest but was reassured by the promissory theme of the section: Jacob was to be saved out of his trouble (v. 7; cf. Dan. 12:1). God would break Babylon’s dominion over Israel; foreigners would enslave them no more; they were to serve the Lord their God and David their king, whom He would raise up for them (Jer. 30:8–9; cf. 23:1–8). Therefore, the listener was encouraged not to fear or be dismayed (vv. 10–11). God would save His servant Israel from captivity, and the people would have rest and quietness (or peace and security) because of His saving presence with them. He would wipe out all of the nations surrounding Israel (cf. 46:1—51:58), but not Israel itself (cf. 5:10, 18; 46:28). The restoration promise was balanced by a time of judgment. God would discipline His people and punish them (30:11). The reality could not be hidden—Israel was in exile as a result of a devastating judgment for their sins. But after a time, God would restore them as His servant in the world.

30:12–17. Judgment as Correction. The concept of God’s punishment as “correction” (v. 11) is expanded in vv. 12–17. The Exile/restoration is described as illness/healing, which is common to both Jeremiah (e.g., 8:15, 22; 10:19; 14:19; 15:18; 30:13; 33:6) and the book of Psalms (e.g., Pss. 22; 38; 41; 74; 79; 80; 83; 90; 102; 109; 137). Israel’s affliction is at first described as incurable (Jer. 30:12). At least, it could not be cured by any of the nation’s erstwhile allies or by any other human means (vv. 13–16). In the end, God would cure Israel and heal the wounds (v. 17). On what grounds would God cure the incurable? The passage moves from hopelessness to hope. It begins with a portrayal of the incurable illness of Israel in exile, with no one pleading the nation’s cause (v. 13), and moves to a description of the nations that had forgotten and not cared for (or sought) the chastised Israel (i.e., Israel is irrelevant to them; vv. 14–15). At that point, however, God would restore Israel (vv. 16–17) because the nations viewed Israel as a despised outcast (v. 17). Thus, God would take action against the nations that judged Israel (vv. 16–17), with the same judgment that God had brought upon Israel (v. 14), and He would release Israel from the deeply humiliating experience of being scattered and exiled before the eyes of the nations. He was moved to forgive and restore in a way similar to the petitioners who prayed in the temple, asking for salvation from “the depths,” “deep waters,” or “the pit” of death (e.g., Pss. 6; 30; 35; 40; 49; 57; 69; 88; 94; 109; 130; 141; 143) while their enemies gloated at their predicament. In these laments, the worshipers of the God of Zion experienced His deliverance because of His love and compassion. This would be Israel’s experience.

In the book of Psalms (e.g., Pss. 46; 48; 76; 84; 87; 122; 132) and in the Prophets (e.g., Is. 2:2–4; 18:7; 60:10–12), God’s deep affinity for Zion is integrated into His plan to be known as God among all the nations of the world (Pss. 47; 93; 96–99). Consequently, the nations' mocking reaction toward Zion (Jer. 30:17) undermined God's mission to the nations. Only if His glory and honor were restored could the God of Zion, the God of Israel, be acclaimed by the nations as Sovereign Ruler of the world.

Thus, the ground for God's "curing the incurable" was His love for His faithful people and His goal to be worshiped by all nations (i.e., the mission of God). God would lift up His wounded people from "the pit" (i.e., exile, contempt, death) to restore them to a new life. This new life would elicit amazement among the nations. Israel's salvation from death would become God's way of making Himself known among the nations. This message parallels the theme of the suffering servant of the Lord (Is. 52:13–53:12), who sheds light on God's redemptive intention behind the suffering and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

30:18–24. Renewed Society. God envisaged a new marriage/covenant with Israel. The gradual movement from Israel's captivity to God's final covenant declaration in vv. 18–22 begins with location and homes (v. 18), followed by a peaceful communal life (v. 19a) and the growth of the population (v. 19b–20b). All external threats and oppression were to be thwarted by God (v. 20c), and their own nobles and governors would be from among themselves (no alien rulers; v. 21). Then, God would draw Israel's ruler to Him (v. 21). The climax is God's pronouncement of the covenant formula: Israel would be His people, and He would be their God (v. 22; cf. Introduction). Finally, Israel's promised salvation assumes Babylon's defeat. No specifics are given in vv. 23–24, but the text describes God's fury moving like a whirlwind against the wicked (including Babylon) in order to perform His intentions. In due course, this would be a reality, but meanwhile God's people were to trust Him and wait for His actions (cf. chaps. 50–51).

31:1–40

The Remnant of Israel Saved

In v. 1, this section resumes the covenant formula of 30:22: God pledged to be the God of all the families of Israel, and they would be His people. This emphasis on God as father and on Israel as families and kindred people characterizes the chapter. Several promissory units follow (31:2–6, 7–14, 15–22, 23–26, 27–30, 31–34, 35–37, 38–40) that address "all Israel" as a worshipping community (vv. 2–6, 33–40) as well as exiles from "Israel"/"Ephraim" (vv. 15–22) and "Judah" (vv. 23–30). The arrangement suggests a chiastic pattern:

- A All Israel (vv. 2–14)
- B Ephraim (vv. 15–22)
- B' Judah (vv. 23–30)
- A' All Israel (vv. 31–40)

31:1–14. Deliverance and Restoration. In 31:2–6, there is a movement from exile to restoration (cf. 30:18–22). We read about the people surviving the sword and finding grace (or favor) in the wilderness (31:2), the rebuilding of community life (building, celebrating, planting, eating), and the pilgrimage to Zion for the worship of God (v. 6); this movement is driven by God's everlasting love (v. 3). God's deliverance of Israel and His granting of new life are celebrated in vv. 7–14. His people, who are referred to as the chief (or foremost) of the nations (cf. Amos 6:1), are summoned to sing, shout, proclaim, give praise, and petition God to save them (Jer. 31:7). All would be brought home from the north (Assyria and Babylon) and the ends of the earth (v. 8). They would weep and pray in gratitude and joy as God their Father led them through dry lands and by the rivers of waters in a straight way where no one would stumble (v. 9).

God told the nations (vv. 10–12) that He had redeemed and ransomed Israel from the hand of those stronger than him and that He who scattered Israel would gather them and keep them as a shepherd does his flock. As a result, Israel would come singing to Zion with shining faces and rejoicing (v. 12; Heb. nahar, "to stream," "shine") at the goodness of the Lord and the wealth of food (see commentary on 51:36–50). Their lives would be like a well-watered garden and free from sorrow. The salvation of the Lord would lead to "rejoicing," the central theme of the unit (31:4, 7, 12–14).

31:15–22. Hope for All Israel. The next unit formally addressed Ephraim but concerned all Israel (vv. 15–22). In a scene of mourning over the dead, God declared that there was hope for the future, including their children (vv. 14–17). Ephraim's grandmother Rachel symbolized the mothers who mourned their lost children (v. 15). When her lost child Ephraim repented, God heard his lamentation and prayer for deliverance (vv. 18–19). It was His fatherly love for Ephraim that moved Him to action. This is depicted in intimate language: God still earnestly "remembered"

Ephraim as His dear son in whom He delighted and for whom He yearned and had mercy and compassion (v. 20).

The concluding appeal for repentance was motivated by God's creative act: a woman would sabab a man (vv. 21–22). This expression is of unknown meaning, and the verb has been variously translated in this passage as “encompass,” “shelter,” or “return.” If it alludes to the Creation story, where man encompassed woman before they became “one flesh” (Gen. 2:21–24), it may mean that God would enhance the fertility of man and wife to greatly compensate for the previous loss of children (31:8, 15).

31:23–30. Prosperity of Judah. Judah is addressed in vv. 23–26. Its future prosperity is illustrated by farmers and shepherds dwelling in the land and its cities. The people would recognize God and bless Judah and Jerusalem. In this land of peace and blessing, God's people would experience sweet, pleasant sleep (cf. blessing in v. 23). Two promises concerning Israel and Judah are made. God would make humans and beasts fruitful (cf. vv. 22, 23–26). As He had overseen the plucking up, tearing down, destruction, overthrow, and calamity of Israel, so would He now watch over them as they built and planted (cf. 1:10). The proverb in 31:29 was often quoted and caused concern among the exiles (cf. Lam. 5:7; Ezek. 18:2–3). It expressed concepts stated in the covenant law (e.g., Ex. 20:5–6; Deut. 5:9b–10). The Lord clarifies that the current situation is not the result of the sins of the forefathers; the sins of the present generation are enough to condemn them.

31:31–40. The New Covenant. The promise of the new covenant was addressed to all Israel (vv. 31–35), renewing the old, broken covenant connected with the deliverance from Egypt. In the new covenant, God declared that He would put His law into the peoples' minds and hearts (as He had always wanted to—Deut. 6:6–9). He would be their God, and they would be His people (Jer. 31:33; cf. e.g., 30:22; 31:1; 32:28). The new covenant is based on God's forgiveness of sin, which would definitively and ultimately be accomplished by Christ (Heb. 8:8–12; 10:16–17). By this, all of His people would know Him (Jer. 31:34).

Finally, Yahweh guaranteed Israel's permanence (vv. 35–40). As long as the heavenly bodies (sun, moon, and stars) remained before the Lord, and as long as heaven remained immeasurable and the earth unsearchable, so Israel would remain before the Lord. In the rebuilding of Jerusalem (vv. 38–40), the area mapped out for the new temple was beyond the old city walls. The area of the Valley of Hinnom, with its dead bodies and ashes (cf. 7:31–32; 19:2, 6; 32:35), down to the Brook of Kidron and the corner of the Horse Gate would be holy unto the Lord. God's presence would restore the city's sanctity.

32:1–44

Jeremiah Buys a Field

Chapter 32 begins with a historical introduction (vv. 1–5), followed by Jeremiah's land purchase (vv. 6–15), his prayer for understanding (vv. 16–25), and God's assurance of Israel's return (vv. 26–44). Jeremiah's purchase of land was a symbolic act of Israel's rightful ownership of the land of Canaan, and consequently, it implied the promise of a future return from the Babylonian Exile.

32:1–15. Purchase of the Land. The context of the purchase was the predicted impending Babylonian Exile. King Zedekiah faced the siege of Jerusalem by the Babylonians (587 B.C.). Jeremiah was imprisoned for having prophesied that the city would be destroyed and that Zedekiah would be taken into exile (vv. 1–5; cf. 38:1–39:10). Jeremiah purchased the land as directed by God (32:6–7, 9–12). One of Jeremiah's relatives, Hanamel, visited him in prison and requested that the prophet buy his field because of Jeremiah's right of inheritance (i.e., redemption)—Israel's laws ensured that the possession of land remained within a tribe or a family (cf. Lev. 25:25–31; Ruth 4:1–2).

The details of the purchase process are given (Jer. 32:10–12), and the scribe Baruch, Jeremiah's assistant, is mentioned here for the first time. Before witnesses, Jeremiah gave the purchase deeds to Baruch (one sealed and one open). On the Lord's instruction, he asked Baruch to put them in a clay container so that they would last for a long time (v. 14). The significance of this act was that houses, fields, and vineyards would be purchased again after the Exile (v. 15). Jeremiah's plot of land was paradigmatic of all the land that Israel lost at this time to the Babylonians but which God would restore to them in the future. The written deeds in the jar symbolized Israel's right to the promised land and God's commitment to restore it to them (vv. 14–15, 42–44).

32:16–44. Jeremiah's Prayerful Dialogue with God. A two-part prayer in the form of a dialogue between Jeremiah and God is next (vv. 16–44). In the dialogue, two interventions in each part of the prayer together form a chiasm that unifies the exchange:

- A Jeremiah's Prayer: God's power to deliver Israel (vv. 17–22)
- B Jeremiah's Prayer: Israel's disobedience and punishment (vv. 23–24)
- B' God's Answer: Israel's disobedience and punishment (vv. 26–35)
- A' God's Answer: God's power to deliver Israel (vv. 36–44)

There are several key elements that deserve to be noted. First, the covenant formula (v. 38; cf. 7:23; 11:4; 24:7; 30:22; 31:1, 33) underscores the deep and intimate relationship between God and His people, as in a marriage: He would be their God, and they would be His people. If stated in the present tense, it is a declaratory formula that actually makes or institutes the covenant. Here it is a prediction revealing God's plan: the future covenant being made in the present by the promissory prophetic word of God. Living in the hope of this promissory word would bring hope as a foretaste of the future reality. Second, God's gift to His people—undivided loyalty and direction—was to manifest itself in the people as the fear of God (32:39; cf. 6:16; 21:8; 24:7; 29:13; 42:3; Ezek. 11:19–20; 36:26–27). Thirdly, the promise of an everlasting covenant (Jer. 32:40) would not be broken or terminated by disobedience and divine judgment, the fear of God being forever in Israel's heart; Lastly, God promised to plant Israel in the promised land with all His "heart" and "soul" (v. 41).

These elements emphasize God's faithfulness and His transforming work in the hearts of human beings with whom He enters into a relationship. God's promises in vv. 36–44 taught Israel that hope for a future good life depended on God's loving care and their faithfulness to Him as their Redeemer Lord. Having the fear of God in one's heart enables people to experience God's love and to commune with Him (cf. Rev. 14:6–7).

33:1–26

Excellence of the Restored Nation

The word of the Lord came a second time while Jeremiah was imprisoned (v. 1; cf. 32:2). Asserting His name by reference to His creative acts (33:2), God invited the listeners to call to Him and promised that He would answer by showing them great and batsurot things. The Hebrew word batsur can mean either "unassailable" (i.e., strong, mighty) or "inaccessible" (v. 3; cf. 32:17, 27). These "things" are seven promissory announcements regarding God's decision to revert the fortunes of Judah from exile to restoration. These promises conclude the Book of Comfort.

33:1–10. Health and Healing. The historical context of these verses was the Babylonian destruction as a result of God hiding His face from Jerusalem. His anger against the wicked people had raged through the victorious Babylonians, who had desolated the cities of Judah and destroyed their houses (vv. 4–5).

God's first promise was to bring health and healing (vv. 6–10; cf. 8:15, 22; 30:17). This theme is common in the psalms of lament (cf. vv. 4–24). God would restore the conditions of old by bringing Israel and Judah back from captivity (shub, "return," and shebut, "captivity") God would restore the fortunes of Judah and Israel (33:7; cf. shub shebut in 29:14; 30:3, 18; 31:23; 32:44; 33:7, 11, 26). He would rebuild the city and make it inhabitable, cleanse the people, and forgive them for their sinful rebellion (vv. 7–8). All the standard Hebrew words for "sin" occur in v. 8: 'awon ("rebellion," "iniquity"), khata' ("to sin"), and pasha' ("to transgress"). The shame and humiliation caused by Israel's sin would be replaced by joy, praise, and honor from God. The nations would be afraid and tremble because of God's goodness to Israel, and His honor among the nations would be restored (v. 9; cf. 30:12–22). The most persuasive evidence of God's kingship in the world is His power to bring the dead back to life. Jeremiah exemplifies this through the healing of Jerusalem, and the Bible revisits this theme in the resurrection of Jesus Christ.

33:11–13. Joy and Gladness and Restoration.

The second promise (vv. 10–11) is of a massive restoration of fortune for Judah and Jerusalem (v. 11; cf. vv. 7, 26). The cities would be re-inhabited, and there would be joy and gladness (of bridegrooms and brides) and praise to God. Three times in Jeremiah, Jerusalem's destruction is illustrated by descriptions of the disappearance of the sounds of weddings (7:34; 16:9; 25:10). As a symbol of joy and life, God would restore the joy of the bridegroom and his bride. The hymnic chorus of praise to yahweh tseba'ot (see "Yahweh Tseba'ot," p. 912) will resound because He is good and His khesed—"mercy," "faithful love," "kindness"—endures forever (cf. Ps. 106:1; 107:1; 118:1-4, 29; 136:1-26).

The third promise (Jer. 33:12-13) announces that the empty cities of Judah (cf. v. 10) would be filled by shepherds and their flocks (cf. 32:44). There would be safe governance (shepherds), abundant food (pastures), and the people (the flock) would again pass under the hands of those counting them. Order, growth, and safety were to be restored.

33:14-18. New Leadership. The fourth promise (vv. 14-16) repeats 23:5-6, adding to it 33:14 and applying the name "The Lord Our Righteousness" or "The Lord Our Righteous Savior" to "her" (Jerusalem) instead of "him" (the Branch). A righteous king of Davidic descent was to arise who would execute justice and righteousness (see commentary on 23:1-8). The identity of the city was inextricably tied to that of the Davidic king.

The fifth promise (vv. 17-18) concerns Israel's governors. The hereditary offices of the Davidic king and the priests/Levites would be permanent. Since the king's tasks are not specified, but those of the priests/Levites are, this promise may imagine Israel as a worshiping community rather than a kingdom. In his judgment speeches, Jeremiah prophesied the permanent abrogation of the corrupted Davidic monarchy (22:30), but 33:14-16 (also 23:5-6) gives room for the fulfillment of the true Davidic covenant. The implied hope of a messianic king is confirmed in the following promise in 33:19-22.

33:19-26. God's Faithfulness to His People. The sixth promise (vv. 19-22) expands on 31:35-37, underscoring the permanence of God's covenants with David (cf. 2 Sam. 7:11-16; Ps. 89:24-37; Is. 55:3) and the priests and Levites (cf. e.g., Ex. 29; Lev. 8). They would remain as surely as the continuance of the created order of day and night. God would multiply their descendants like the countless stars and immeasurable sand of the sea. The final promise (vv. 23-26) is a response to the fact that the nations had despised God's chosen people (Israel and Judah) by assuming that God would no longer consider them a nation. This argument against faith in God's promises is refuted by a reference to God's ordering of night and day and heaven and earth (cf. 31:35-37; 33:20-22).

The concluding words confirm God's intention, based on chapters 30-33, to bring the captives back (or "restore their fortunes") and have compassion on them. This promise was fulfilled in 537 B.C. when the Persian king Cyrus ordered the return of the exiles. However, if the promise of a Davidic king in Israel concerned an earthly king, it was not fulfilled. As a messianic promise, many hundred years later, Christians acclaimed Jesus as the "Christ" (Messiah), not of an earthly kingdom but of the kingdom of God (Matt. 16:16; Acts 17:7; Rev. 19:16).

34:1—35:19

CASE STUDIES: INFIDELITY AND FIDELITY

This block contains two narrative examples of infidelity (Zedekiah: 34:1-7; treatment of slaves: vv. 8-22) and one of fidelity (the Rechabites: 35:1-11). Two case studies are discussed in the conclusion (vv. 12-19).

34:1-7

Zedekiah Warned by God

The setting for the first case study was the Babylonian invasion (vv. 1-2, 6-7; cf. 21:1-7; 37:3-10; 38:14-28). Only two fortified cities near Jerusalem continued to resist (34:6-7; cf. 2 Chr. 11:5-11). Azekah (Tell Zakariya, southwest of Jerusalem) and Lachish (Tell ed-Duweir, further north) appear in one of the letters found in the debris of Lachish's destruction in 586 B.C. ("And let [my Lord] know that we are watching for the signals of Lachish...for we cannot see Azekah"). Jeremiah's prophecy suggests a massive attack (Jer. 34:1). God's warnings through Jeremiah had been proven true (cf. 32:25).

Jeremiah warned King Zedekiah concerning Babylon's approaching victory, Jerusalem's destruction, and the king's captivity in Babylon (cf. 34:2-3; 32:3-4a). However, this is followed by a description of a different fate for Zedekiah: the king would not die by the sword but in peace. He would be honored in death and duly buried and grieved (34:4-5; cf. 52:8-11). Probably the best way to interpret this shift is to suggest that Jeremiah was telling Zedekiah what would happen to him if he surrendered to the king of Babylon instead of opposing him, as suggested in 38:17-18. Zedekiah's actual fate is evidence that he did not pay attention to the message of the Lord (53:8-11). Thus, Israel had two options for responding to God: infidelity and fidelity. This theme is developed further in 34:8—35:19.

34:8–22*Treacherous Treatment of Slaves

Infidelity was exemplified by the people and their leaders. They broke the covenant by not freeing their male and female Hebrew slaves every seventh year (vv. 8–9, 14; cf. Ex. 21:1–6; Deut. 15:1–18). Fellow Israelites became slaves because they were unable to pay their debts. The sabbatical law not only presumed that the debt would be written off but also required that a freed slave receive a liberal provision of food and drink (Deut. 15:14). Faithfulness to this law implied that Israel “remembered their slavery in Egypt and the Lord’s redemption” (Deut. 15:15)—this was an act of faith that demonstrated care for one’s kin in the covenant community. Zedekiah compelled the people to follow this law. However, though they initially obeyed, the princes and the people eventually changed their minds and broke the covenant (Jer. 34:8–11, 15–16), perhaps out of greed and selfishness. Such infidelity implied gross indifference to God and to the duty of sharing His gifts with people in need.

God drew a parallel (vv. 12–22) between the covenant He made with Israel’s fathers (vv. 13–14) and the covenant regarding freedom for Hebrew slaves made by Zedekiah (vv. 8–9, 15–16). Both covenants concerned a proclamation of release, but God’s fidelity and Judah’s infidelity are contrasted. Using a wordplay on “turn” (shub; cf. 3:1–4:4; 8:4–6; 15:19), God asserted (34:15) that Israel turned (tashubu) back (or “repented”) to covenant fidelity and swore to practice the commandment regarding liberty for debt slaves. But this commitment was soon abandoned: they turned around (tashubu) from covenant fidelity and profaned God’s name by bringing the debt slaves back into subjection. Since the oath of the covenant was taken in the temple in God’s name, breaking the oath meant profaning His name (v. 16). God concluded that Judah had broken their oath to the Lord, making a mockery out of Him and of their obligation to fellow members of the covenant community.

God sentenced Judah using an ironic wordplay: because of their infidelity in not proclaiming freedom to their own people, He would proclaim freedom to the sword, plague, and famine (v. 17a). He would give Judah into the hands of the Babylonians, and Judah and Jerusalem would become desolate (vv. 17–22). This sentence is based on the fact that all the people had entered the covenant with Him and cut the calf in two and passed between the parts of it

(vv. 18–19). Again, a wordplay is included: the word cut (karat) is used both for the making of the covenant (vv. 8, 13) and for the cutting (karat) of the animal, which represented the fate of covenant breakers (v. 18; cf. Gen. 15:7–11, 17).

The argument in Jer. 34:8–22, then, is that covenant fidelity, exemplified in the act of releasing the debt slaves, would bring safety and well-being to Jerusalem. Breaking the covenant by economic exploitation, however, would clear the way for the invasion of Babylon. Obedience to the Lord brings peace, but disobedience brings destruction. God had entered into a covenant with His people based on His work of redemption on their behalf. Their role was to accept Him as their God and respond in gratitude and obedience. If they trusted Him, He would continue to protect and save them from their enemies. But because they rejected Him and no longer trusted Him, the covenant was violated.

35:1–19*The Obedient Rechabites and Conclusion

In contrast to Judah’s disobedience, the obedience of the Rechabites is adduced as a model. God asked Jeremiah to bring the Rechabites into one of the chambers in the temple area and to test them by giving them wine to drink (vv. 1–2). They refused because their father commanded them not to drink wine or build houses, sow seed, plant vineyards, or own any of these things, but to live in tents and maintain a nomadic lifestyle (vv. 3–7). They had obeyed their father’s command. Only when the Babylonians entered the land did they seek refuge in Jerusalem (vv. 8–11). God then compared the disobedience of Judah and Jerusalem with the obedience of the Rechabites (vv. 12–16). The Rechabites obeyed their human father, and Judah refused to obey their divine Father. He had tried to call Judah to repentance through His prophets. Had they obeyed, they would have dwelled in the land He had given them. But they did not. Therefore, God’s sentence of doom against Judah would be executed (v. 17).

God also recognized the obedience of the Rechabites and rewarded them with the promise that their descendants would prevail and there would always be a servant of the Lord from their household. The Hebrew expression ’omed lepanay, literally “stand before,” is associated with the concept of standing before an authority ready to serve (Gen. 41:46; 1 Kin. 1:28; 17:1). Accordingly, some translations render it as “serve.” A life of fidelity results in blessing and communion with God, but infidelity results in the loss of God’s protection. Jeremiah 34–35, therefore, is an urgent message to the listeners to be faithful to God and His word. This faithfulness is also a mark of the end-time community of faith (Rev. 14:12).

36:1—45:5

JEREMIAH AND THE FALL OF THE CITY

This portion of the book reveals that God’s will was visibly working in the shifts of international power occurring in the ANE. Refusal to accept the “pro-Babylonian” reading of the destiny of Jerusalem was seen as disobedience to God’s word and will. This section is also about the experiences of Jeremiah shortly before and after the fall of Jerusalem. Baruch was Jeremiah’s scribe, preserving the prophecies (36:1–32), and Jeremiah would be imprisoned during the fall of the city (37:1–40:6). The section details an insurrection against Gedaliah (40:7–41:18) and finally a flight to Egypt (42:1–44:30). It closes with an assurance to Baruch (45:1–5).

36:1–32

The Jeremiah Scroll

Jeremiah had been on trial for his life. Although acquitted, he was treated with suspicion by the Jerusalem establishment (cf. chaps. 7, 26). Thus, chapter 36 pictures him as an outsider and an unwelcome threat to prevailing policies. The confrontation between Jeremiah and King Jehoiakim (609–597 B.C.) is a classic example of “truth speaking to power.” Chapter 36 is central for understanding how prophets preserved their messages for future generations and how these messages finally became part of the biblical canon. Jeremiah’s scroll had come to have a life of its own and to exercise authority independently of Jeremiah. It was, at this time, the written word of God that challenged the king.

36:1–3. Purpose of the Scroll. It was in 605 B.C. (v. 1a) that God commanded Jeremiah to write His words on a megillat seper, “scroll of writing” (vv. 2, 4; Ps. 40:8; Ezek. 2:9; cf. the single word megillah, “scroll,” in Jer. 36; Ezek. 3:1–3; Zech. 5:1–2). The book was not an invention of Jeremiah but of God. Jeremiah was to write down all of the words God had given to him from the beginning of his ministry regarding Israel, Judah, and the nations (Jer. 36:2). The purpose was to inform the people of Judah about the potential disasters God was threatening in order to encourage them to turn from their wicked ways so that God would forgive them of their sin and guilt (v. 3).

36:4–19. Role of Baruch. Baruch the son of Neriah wrote the scroll at Jeremiah’s instruction (v. 4). A clay imprint of a seal from Jeremiah’s time, which was used for sealing papyrus scrolls, has been found with the text “Belonging to Berechiah [short form of Baruch] son of Neriah.” Because he was either barred from entering the temple or was imprisoned (cf. 7:2–15; 20:3), Jeremiah commissioned Baruch to read the scroll in the temple to all the people of Judah so that repentant prayer might avert the anger of the Lord (36:5–9).

Baruch’s public reading was heard in the temple and repeated before the princes in the palace (vv. 10–15). The leaders reacted with fear and promised to tell the king (v. 16). They asked if Baruch wrote the scroll at Jeremiah’s instruction. When Baruch affirmed this (vv. 17–18), the prophetic authenticity of the scroll was established. Anticipating the king’s reaction, they warned Jeremiah and Baruch to go into hiding (v. 19; cf. v. 26).

36:20–32. Burning and Rewriting of the Scroll. Receiving a verbal summary, the king ordered the scroll to be brought to him and asked Jehudi to read it (vv. 20–21). For every three or four columns that Jehudi read, the king cut the scroll with a scribe’s knife and cast it into the fire until the whole scroll was burned (vv. 21–23; a papyrus sheet normally had room for three to four columns).

Jeremiah rewrote the scroll at God’s command (vv. 27–28). It was accompanied by a divine indictment and a judicial sentence against the king. Sadly, the narrative includes a brief assertion indicating that the rewritten warning did not have the desired effect (vv. 29–31). The sentence of condemnation was harsh: no leader would sit on David’s throne, and the king’s corpse would be dishonorably cast out into the heat of day and the frost of night. God would punish him, his family, and his servants and would bring on them and on Jerusalem and Judah all of the predicted disasters.

This narrative illustrates how God counters human pride and resistance. God’s relentless resolve brings the truth back again and again to those who need to hear it. His word cannot be stopped, only ignored or accepted. Chapter 36 reveals that Jeremiah’s proclamation of judgment was intended to lead Judah to change its ways. Yes, the Babylonian invasion was inescapable, but, in order to survive, it was necessary for the people to listen to God's voice. He yearned to forgive their sins (v. 3) and to grant them peace and well-being. He wanted once more to be their God and for them to be His people (cf. 30:1—33:26).

37:1—40:6

Jeremiah Imprisoned and the Fall of Jerusalem

After the final reaction of the king to the word of God, he could only wait and witness the fulfillment of the word of judgment against him and the land. Next, the events surrounding Jerusalem's fall in 586 B.C. are described. Judah's struggle for survival in the international rivalry between Babylon and Egypt impacted Jeremiah's life and ministry.

37:1–10. A King Seeking Help. King Zedekiah (597–586 B.C.) was at first a Babylonian puppet king who finally rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar. The text indicates that the king, his servants, and the people refused to accept God's words through Jeremiah (v. 2). Zedekiah had abandoned his covenant faithfulness, and by ignoring the Lord's word, he had brought about Judah's fall.

Surprisingly, he asked Jeremiah to intercede for the people (v. 3). He wanted the prophet's (God's) aid but did not want to obey the prophet's (God's) command. This type of compromise is unacceptable.

The king's request was motivated by fear and desperation rather than faith. Jerusalem was under siege by the Babylonians (v. 5; cf. vv. 7–10). Against Jeremiah's clear warning, Zedekiah had rebelled against Babylon's rule, relying on Egypt for help (cf. Ezek. 17:15; 29:1–21). The Babylonians reacted quickly and imposed a siege on Jerusalem from the beginning of 588 to August 586 B.C. (2 Kin. 25; Jer. 21:3–7; 39:1–10; 52:4–5; Ezek. 24:1–2). Under Pharaoh Hophra, Egypt supported Judah militarily (Jer. 37:5–11; cf. Lam. 4:17; Ezek. 17; 29–32), but this temporary support was insufficient to save Judah. After the Babylonians' temporary withdrawal from Jerusalem (Jer. 37:5), Jeremiah insisted that Pharaoh's army would return to Egypt and the Babylonians would come back, take Jerusalem, and burn it (vv. 6–10). This was bad news for the king and gave no warrant for interpreting the movements of the two imperial powers in Judah's favor.

37:11–21. Jeremiah's Arrest and Imprisonment. The story in this passage provides evidence for the level of fear and paranoia that had engulfed the court and the confusion regarding the loyalty of Jeremiah. The prophet had opposed the politics of the king, supporting surrender to the Babylonians instead of fighting them. Now during a moment of respite, the prophet left the city to claim his property in the land of Benjamin and was unjustly accused of defection to the Babylonians. This was a serious charge of treason. Jeremiah's enemies in the army and at court found a pretext to arrest, abuse, and imprison him. The relationship between Zedekiah and Jeremiah had been problematic. Since the charges were serious, the king probably approved of the actions taken against Jeremiah. The king's reason for seeking a word from the Lord is not stated, but one could suggest that since Jeremiah was in a precarious situation, Zedekiah may have hoped that he would deliver a positive message in exchange for deliverance from prison. But a true prophet cannot alter the word of the Lord. Zedekiah's steadfast practice of ignoring that word had already sealed his fate. God's word remained, and no last-minute and feckless courtesies to the prophet he had despised could alter the course he had chosen.

38:1–13. Back to the Dungeon. The insincerity of Zedekiah's apparent kindness to Jeremiah was evident in his decision to send him back to prison on pressure from the cabal at the court. But Jeremiah's deliverance from inevitable death depended on the compassion of Ebed-Melech the Ethiopian, one of the eunuchs in the king's palace. He informed the king about Jeremiah's condition, and the king ordered Jeremiah's release (vv. 7–13). Ebed-Melech's act was an act of faith in God and His word. Later on, Jeremiah announced to him the Lord's promise that He would deliver him from the sword at the coming destruction of Jerusalem because he had put his trust in Him (39:15–18). There is a close solidarity between God and His servant the prophet, and people's actions against the prophet are indeed actions against God and His word (cf. Matt. 25:40).

38:14–28. Once Again, the King and the Prophet. In a secret conversation, Zedekiah asked for straightforward counsel, and Jeremiah could not have been plainer: surrender and live, resist and die. In order to persuade the king, Jeremiah pointed to the outcome of a wrong decision: it would harm his wives and children (vv. 22–23a), his close friends would turn against him (v. 22b), he himself would be captured (v. 23b), and his city would be burned (v. 23c).

The king did not seem to realize the danger he was in (vv. 24–26). Rather than dealing with the larger issue, he kept God's word secret, fearing the princes in Jerusalem more than the Babylonians. The king and the princes of Judah were about to face complete destruction, but rather than accept God's word, which would allow them and their people to live, they dwelled on their petty intrigues and disputes over personal power. Jeremiah remained in prison and was still there when Jerusalem was taken (v. 28).

39:1–18. Fall of the City. The most significant event in the book is the fall of the city, mentioned in the prologue (1:1–3) and in the historical epilogue (52:1–30). It is the central topic in numerous judgment speeches of Jeremiah and is the background for the words of comfort given to the faithful. Jerusalem's fall and Zedekiah's fate, in this account, are the fulfillment of God's word, and they confirm Jeremiah's prophetic ministry (39:1–10). After penetrating the walls of Jerusalem, the princes of Babylon sat down in the Middle Gate (cf. 21:4). Zedekiah and his armed men were able to escape by night, but the Babylonians pursued and captured them in the plains of Jericho, eighteen miles (30 km) northeast of Jerusalem. They were brought to Nebuchadnezzar in his headquarters in Riblah, on the Orontes River in Hamath, Syria.

Nebuchadnezzar killed Zedekiah's sons and all the nobles of Judah. He then put out the eyes of Zedekiah, bound him, and carried him off to Babylon. Killing Zedekiah's sons may have been intended to halt future claims to the throne. The killing of the nobles may have had to do with their anti-Babylonian position, which is well documented in Jeremiah and would have been known to the pro-Babylonian faction. The torture of Zedekiah is usually understood as an example of Babylonian cruelty—the killing of his sons was the last thing he would ever see—however, inflicting blindness may also be understood in a wider context. First, blinding could be an ANE suzerain's punishment for a rebellious vassal, for Nebuchadnezzar had made a treaty with Zedekiah when he became king of Judah in 597 B.C., which Zedekiah had confirmed with an oath (cf. Ezek. 17:11–21). Second, being blinded was included among the punishments for breaking the Lord's covenant (Deut. 28:28–29, 32). Third, Jeremiah's numerous prophecies against the kings of Judah included the punishment of no longer seeing the homeland (Jer. 22:8–12; 42:17–18) and never again seeing the good that God would do for His people (29:32). Although Zedekiah was largely responsible for the disaster, his fate was for now left open-ended (cf. 32:3–5; 34:2–5). The idea seems to be that even if Zedekiah were to survive imprisonment and return to Jerusalem, he would not be able to see the land, which was the predicted punishment for breaking the covenant. It was precisely this cruel warfare practice that the Lord had wanted the king to avoid by listening to His word.

After the destruction of Jerusalem (39:8; cf. 52:12–14), Nebuzaradan, the Babylonian captain of the guard, carried away the remnant of the people to Babylon but left the poor in Judah and gave them vineyards and fields (39:9–10). This was an initial fulfillment of God's promise to give His people "a future and a hope" (29:11). God's people were, at this time, a remnant in Judah and a remnant in exile. Both groups had to wait for the fulfillment of God's promises. Jeremiah was set free from prison by the Babylonians (39:11–18). He was not to be harmed, and his wishes were to be followed. Jeremiah was assigned to Gedaliah, who took him home to Anathoth in Benjamin to dwell among the people (for the account regarding Ebed-Melech in vv. 15–18, see commentary on 38:1–13.)

40:1–6. Jeremiah and Nebuzaradan. More details are given about the future of Jeremiah. The town of Ramah, five miles (8 km) north of Jerusalem, served as a staging post for captives bound for Babylon. Jeremiah had been brought there in chains (v. 1), but Nebuzaradan liberated him and gave him two options: either to follow the captain to Babylon or remain in the land. Later, Nebuzaradan gave Jeremiah another choice: either to follow Gedaliah, the new governor over the cities of Judah, or go wherever he wanted. Jeremiah decided to stay with Gedaliah at Mizpah, among the people who were left in the land.

Nebuzaradan's speech (vv. 2–5) summarizes the fulfillment of God's judgment on Jerusalem and Judah and explains its cause: their sinfulness and disobedience. Although this was spoken by the Babylonian captain of the guard, its truth is undeniable and originated from God. The defeat of the city was not credited by this Babylonian to the superiority of his gods but to the actions of the God of Jeremiah in reaction to the sins of His people.

40:7—41:18*The Insurrection against Gedaliah

This section deals with the governorship of Gedaliah in Judah and the plot to kill him. The setting is Judah after the Babylonian conquest (39:1–10). The idea of an escape to Egypt emerges toward the end of the narrative (41:17–18; cf. 42:1—44:30).

40:7–8. New Leaders in Judea. After the fall of Jerusalem, three parties are represented under Gedaliah, Ishmael, and Johanan. A respected Judean, Gedaliah son of Ahikam, was pro-Babylonian (vv. 5, 9). His father and grandfather had been sympathetic to Jeremiah (e.g., 26:24). Ishmael fought fiercely for Judean independence, cooperating with the small neighboring nations. And Johanan eventually opted for Egypt. Jeremiah had long opposed Ishmael's goal (e.g., 38:2–3). He would also object to Johanan's belief that Egypt was the solution (42:1—44:30). However, Gedaliah, who agreed with Jeremiah's pro-Babylonian views and with whom Jeremiah was dwelling in Mizpah, would fall victim to a conspiracy. The story of Gedaliah illustrates that the political tensions and divisions that existed in Jerusalem before its fall (see commentary on 37:1—40:6) continued after it.

40:9—41:18. Gedaliah. Gedaliah spoke to the people under oath and assured them safe dwelling and income from wine, summer fruit, and olive oil (40:7–10). All Judeans who were scattered during the war returned from Moab, Ammon, Edom, and other countries (vv. 11–12). However, Gedaliah was soon killed by Ishmael and his men. The rebels killed many others and carried away as captives all the remaining people in Mizpah, including the king's daughters who had been left in Gedaliah's care. Hearing of these atrocities, Johanan and the captains of the forces pursued Ishmael and found him in Gibeon. His Judean captives escaped and joined Johanan, while Ishmael and eight men joined the Ammonites (see 40:7—41:15). Johanan gathered his people and set out for Egypt, in fear of a Babylonian retaliation for the murder of Gedaliah, who had been appointed governor by the king of Babylon. On the way, they stayed in Chimham, near Bethlehem (41:17).

42:1—45:5*Flight to and Experiences in Egypt

The flight to Egypt was characterized by fear and rebellion against the Lord. This block of material describes the prophetic ministry of Jeremiah among the survivors as they traveled to and lived in Egypt. He received five messages from the Lord: one on the way to Egypt (42:1–22), three while in Egypt (43:8–13; 44:1–19, 20–30), and one for Baruch (45:1–5).

42:1—43:7. Requesting a Message. When the leaders ran out of options, they turned to Jeremiah and sought the word of God (cf. 37:3, 17; 38:14, 24–28). Thus, Johanan's Judean remnant, who were already escaping to Egypt in disobedience (41:17–18), asked Jeremiah for divine guidance regarding what the "remnant" should do (42:1–3). The request came at a decisive moment. Johanan's people understood that they were a small and vulnerable community, encamped near Bethlehem en route to Egypt. Their choice was vital to God's plan for Israel (i.e., to reveal His glory to all the nations). They promised Jeremiah unconditional obedience to God's will (vv. 5–6; cf. Ex. 24:3, 7; Josh. 24:21, 24; 1 Sam. 7:4, 6–8; 12:19). They acknowledged that they had been "many" but were at this time "few." Israel had begun as a small group when Jacob's family went to Egypt, but they later became numerous (Deut. 10:22). When Johanan referred to his group as being the few left over from the many, it was a reminder of how God's blessing of multiplication had been reversed with a curse of diminution.

God offered two options (Jer. 42:10–22), each with a condition and its consequence. The positive option was to remain in Judah. If they did so, then God would build and plant the remnant of His people (vv. 10–12). The negative option was to go to Egypt (to avoid war and famine), which would mean disobeying God. If they chose this option, then the sword, plague, and famine, which they feared, would overtake them (vv. 16–17). The same divine fury that struck Jerusalem would reach them in Egypt, making them a public example of divine rejection (vv. 13–18). God's word was plain: do not go to Egypt (v. 19).

43:8–13. Jeremiah's Message in Tahpanhes.

Jeremiah received another message from the Lord (vv. 8–13). He was commanded to take stones and secretly hide them in the brick courtyard at the entrance to Pharaoh's house. This was interpreted to mean that God would send Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon, His servant, to set his throne over these hidden stones and to spread his royal pavilion over them. Nebuchadnezzar would defeat Egypt and would bring death and exile (v. 11). He would destroy the temples of the Egyptian gods and break down the sacred stones of Beth Shemesh (lit. "house of the sun"), which was central to sun worship (cf. 46:1-28). Acting as God's servant, Babylon's destruction of Egypt and its gods would testify to the sovereignty of Israel's God (43:12). The response of the people is not stated, but a considerable group of Judeans went to Egypt (44:1).

44:1-19. Message of Judgment. In the first part of God's message through Jeremiah in this section, there is a summary of God's wrath against Judah and Jerusalem because of their disobedience (vv. 2-6). In the second part, Jeremiah announced that the Judeans in Egypt were practicing the same idolatry that had led Judah to disaster (vv. 3, 5, 8). Consequently, all of them would be cut off (vv. 7-10) or rejected by God (cf. e.g., Ex. 30:33, 38; 31:14; Lev. 7:20). The destruction of Jerusalem had not humbled them. They did not fear God and did not live according to the covenant. Therefore, the Judean remnant in Egypt would die (Jer. 44:11-14)—the standard punishment for breaking the covenant was death by the sword, famine, and plague (vv. 12-13). God's declaration that they would be destroyed in the land of Egypt was balanced by an open door of invitation for individuals who desired to dwell in Judah (v. 14). The possibility of a faithful remnant remained. God did not give up on His plan to restore His people in Judah.

Unfortunately, the people rejected God's word (vv. 15-19). They continued to burn incense to the queen of heaven and pour out drink offerings to her, as they and their forefathers and kings did in Judah (cf. 7:18), where they had plenty of food, prospered, and were safe. Their flagrant and shameless apostasy was rooted in a fundamental misunderstanding, for their past blessings did not come from the queen of heaven but from the Lord. Their hardship at this time was the result of their disobedience. It was possible for their well-being to be restored by repentance, but in their degenerate state, they were not interested in returning to the true God.

44:20-30. Message against the Apostasy of the Judeans. Jeremiah addressed the people's reliance on the queen of heaven. First, he declared Judah and the Judean remnant in Egypt to be one and the same. They had burned incense (as admitted in vv. 15-19, 24-25), sinned against the Lord, and had not obeyed His torah ("law," "instruction"), khugqah ("decrees," "statutes"), and 'edot ("testimonies," "stipulations"; i.e., they had refused to heed the words of the prophet). Second, God summarized what the Judean remnant in Egypt had said (vv. 24-25). The men and their wives had made vows and had implemented them by burning incense to the queen of heaven and pouring out drink offerings to her. So God sarcastically told them to continue performing and fulfilling these vows.

Third, the judgment in vv. 26-30 against the Judeans in Egypt repeats what is found in vv. 11-14. God disassociated Himself from the Judean community in Egypt. Just as they had sworn an oath to worship the queen of heaven (v. 25), so God swore that His great name would no longer be used by these Judeans in their oaths (v. 26). Because of their apostasy, the Judean community was alone and without God. Yet, again, there was a faithful remnant: a small number would escape the sword and return from Egypt to Judah, and all the remnant of Judah who went to Egypt would come to know whose word would endure—God's or theirs (v. 28). God announced a particular sign that would confirm that His words would surely stand against them: Pharaoh Hophra would be given into the hands of his enemies, just as King Zedekiah had been given to the Babylonians (v. 30). God was acting here in defense of His authority, His plan, the covenant with Israel, and His prophetic word, which invites repentance from idolatry and predicts judgment against the disobedient. In the midst of judgment, however, He carefully kept the door open for a faithful remnant desiring to follow His instruction.

45:1-5. Assurance to Baruch. This long section (chaps. 36-45) concludes with a message to Baruch that was given after he wrote the words of Jeremiah on the scroll, before the fall of Jerusalem. The message is motivated by a lament he expressed after writing the scroll for Jeremiah (45:2-3). Baruch complained that the Lord had added sorrow to his grief and left him without rest. Through Jeremiah, the Lord confirmed His judgment against Judah: He would tear down what He had built and uproot what He had planted (v. 4; cf. 1:10; 18:7; 24:6; 31:28; 42:10). He then reprimanded Baruch for expecting too much. He was not to seek great things for himself because the coming judgment would bring adversity onto all people. However, God would give his life to him as a prize (i.e., spoil or prize of war) everywhere he went (45:5). God knows the pain of His servants and comforts them.

There is a future with Him for those who, in faith, risk everything.

46:1—51:64

JUDGMENT AGAINST THE NATIONS

Prophecies against foreign nations are common in the prophetic books (e.g., Amos 1–2; Is. 13–23; Ezek. 25–32). The messages reveal Israel's God as Sovereign Lord over all nations, none of whom could effectively challenge His authority and power. Their rise and fall is an unmistakable witness to such universal sovereignty. Theologically, Jeremiah 46:1—51:64 presumes that the God of Israel had created the world (see Jeremiah: Introduction) and assigned it to different nations (Gen. 10; Deut. 32:8). Consequently, He was to be feared and worshiped by the nations (Ps. 96; cf. Rev. 14:6–7). He was their King, and they were His servants (Jer. 10:7, 10; 46:18; 48:15; 51:57; cf. Ps. 96), and He had the right to hold them accountable (Jer. 18:7–10). His intention was to move them to fear Him and give glory to Him, as modeled in His covenant with Israel, through whom He would accomplish His purpose (3:17; 4:2; cf. Ex. 19:5–6; Ps. 2:8; 82:8; Is. 2:2–4; 49:1–7). God acted as Israel's protector against hostile nations, provided they remained faithful to Him (cf. Num. 23:9; Ps. 2:1, 8; 46:6–7). If Israel were unfaithful, God would judge them in accordance with His judgment of all nations (as amply illustrated in Jeremiah). The prophecies against the nations in Jeremiah were designed for Israel's instruction, particularly for those in exile.

46:1–28

Against Egypt

God's massive judgment against all people (lit. "flesh") was to begin with Egypt. It was, at that time, the only power capable of resisting Babylon. In Israel's history, Egypt symbolizes those who resist God's will. The escape of the Judean remnant to Egypt caused God to issue harsh judgments against Egypt (43:10–13; 44:30).

46:1–12. Introduction and Battle. Verse 1 introduces chapters 46–51, declaring that the word of the Lord determines the future of the nations (cf. 1:10). This connection between 1:10 (the core theme of Jeremiah's call in vv. 4–19) and 46:1 suggests that the book of Jeremiah revolves around God's rule and the supremacy of His kingdom. The abrupt title found in v. 2, lemitsrayim—"against" or "concerning Egypt"—is meaningful only in the context of God as Ruler and Judge of the nations. The full title mentions the battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.) where the Babylonians defeated Pharaoh Necho II. The ensuing prophecy describes Egypt under the burden of this defeat.

The battle of Carchemish proved the foolishness of relying on Egypt (vv. 3–12). God invited the audience to imagine a dramatic battle that would demonstrate the weakness and shame of Egypt (vv. 3–4). The Babylonian army was called to move into action while the Egyptian army was already in retreat, struck by fear (vv. 5–6). Playing on its intention to rise up and cover the earth, like the annual flooding of the Nile, Egypt was derisively summoned to battle with its horses, chariots, and army of allies (vv. 7–9). Egypt's real enemy was not the Babylonians; it was the Lord God (v. 10). Babylon was merely His tool. His rule required the demise of Egypt, and the shame of the defeated empire was heard among all the nations (v. 12).

46:13–28. Impotence of the Egyptian Gods.

God predicted the Babylonian attack on Egypt (568 B.C.). God would assert His power by defeating Pharaoh and his gods (vv. 15–17). Verse 15 may be a reference to the sacred bull Apis that represented the god Ptah of Memphis. God's imagery belittled "powerful" Egypt. Using the metaphor of a biting fly defeating a beautiful heifer (as a sarcastic reference to Egyptian bull worship; cf. vv. 15, 21), He illustrated how the mighty empire, with all its gods, would be overcome by the sting of a small insect. From the image of something mighty and numerous being destroyed by something small and singular, the text switches to an image of something small and singular (a snake) being cut down by something mighty (an army with axes) and numerous (like locusts or grasshoppers). All that the Egyptians could do was hiss like a serpent (v. 22).

Israel's God would punish Egypt's national god, Amon of No (i.e., Amun of Thebes), and all of Egypt with its gods and its kings (vv. 25–26). The punishment of Pharaoh and those trusting in him would include the Judean remnant, who relied on Pharaoh's protection instead of obeying God's call to dwell in Judah (see chaps. 42–44). Israel's God is indeed the Sovereign King of the nations. Therefore, the word of comfort to Israel in 30:10–11 (cf. 45:4–5) is repeated here (46:27–28). God would extinguish the power of all the nations except that of Israel. He would not leave Israel without due punishment, but they were not to be afraid, for He would bring them home and give them rest.

47:1–7*Against Philistia

The Philistines were old enemies of Israel (cf. 1 Sam. 4), but by the time of Jeremiah, Philistia had been reduced to a pawn of Egypt (cf. Jer. 47:1). Consequently, this prophecy is short and follows the one against Egypt. The Philistines were under threat from the north, and the description of their peril uses formulas common in Jeremiah for invasions and war. But it was the Lord who would punish the Philistines (v. 4). The invader from the north was the sword of the Lord (vv. 6–7). No specific reason is given for this judgment against Philistia. But the defeat of this ancient enemy by the Lord was to instill in Israel the hope that God would eventually restore His people's fortunes.

48:1–47*Against Moab

This lengthy prophecy is structured as an explanatory sequence of woes (i.e., “trouble,” “death,” “judgment”; v. 1), which constantly shifts between admonitions to escape, indictments, judgments, and lamentations. The historical events are unknown, and many of the locations mentioned cannot be pinpointed. The section has obvious links with other OT passages (e.g., Num. 21:28–29; 24:17; Deut. 28:49, 52; Is. 15:2–5; 16:6–12; 24:17–18). It addresses a close neighbor on the other side of the Jordan River with a long history of rivalry with Israel and Judah.

48:1–13. Moab's Judgment and Complacency.

The woe in 48:1–9 predicts the destruction of the cities of Moab. The judgment upon these military strongholds and centers of economic power would elicit cries of mourning and desperation throughout Moab. The inhabitants were admonished to escape and save themselves although they would be like the juniper in the wilderness—a symbol of desolation (vv. 6, 9). Chemosh (the Moabite chief god; cf. 1 Kin. 11:7) would be powerless and exiled with his priests and princes. All Moab would be attacked, and every city and the entire land would be made desolate.

Moab was accused of complacency through the metaphor of winemaking (Jer. 48:10–13). All of its life, Moab had been, like wine, at ease, prosperous, and indolent (cf. Amos 6:1; Zeph. 1:12). Moab was the wine that had been left undisturbed, not moved about or poured out, which means that it had not experienced exile/captivity. The absence of turmoil had made Moab complacent. Now God would pour out its bottles and smash its jars (Jer. 48:12–13). This is a reference to destruction and exile. Thus, Moab would resemble Israel under judgment and would be ashamed, together with its god Chemosh, in whom it trusted.

48:14–28. Moab's Pride and Indictment. Another accusation against Moab highlighted its pride. Moab had no reason to be proud, for it would be plundered and its young men slaughtered (vv. 14–16). Its former power would be broken (vv. 17, 20). As an illustration of this fate, the inhabitants of Aroer (also north of the River Arnon) were admonished to ask the fleeing crowds what had happened; the response was that Moab had been shamed, broken, and ruined (vv. 19–20). God's case against Moab was painted in rich and varied images in a dual indictment followed by judgment (vv. 21–28). The first indictment was that Moab had arrogantly defied the Lord (v. 26). This is a peculiar statement since Moab had no covenant with Israel's God. However, it fits the theme of the Lord as Ruler of the nations. Israel celebrated this in hymns which called all nations to acknowledge the Lord as the true God (Ps. 93–99; cf. Rev. 14:7–8). Moab had offended the Lord's honor and status as Ruler of the universe by its proud self-seeking (Jer. 48:26) and its scorn of Israel (v. 27). The latter was the second indictment. The language here resembles the psalms of lament (Ps. 59:8; Jer. 20:7; Lam. 1:7). Moab's contempt for Israel had offended God because an intimate relationship existed between God and His people that could encourage Israel in exile and give them hope.

Following this dual indictment, the judgment was severe. Moab would lose its power and strength (Jer. 48:21–25). It would be made drunk by God's cup of wrath (cf. 25:15) and would wallow in its own vomit (48:26)—an image of humiliation and degradation. It would be treated with the same contempt that it had held for Israel (v. 26; cf. v. 27). The offense and its punishment corresponded, according to the principle of retribution (Ex. 21:23–24; Lev. 24:19–20; Deut. 19:21; cf. Matt. 5:38–42). Moab was admonished to flee to a remote location, hiding in caves among the rocks (Jer. 48:28)—another sign of humiliation.

48:29–39. Lawsuit and Punishment. The next unit includes a lawsuit with an indictment (vv. 29–30) and a punishment (vv. 31–33; cf. Is. 16:6–10). The indictment develops the theme of Moab's arrogance (Jer. 48:26). In a terse proverbial utterance, the verdict was made—Moab's arrogance was without substance (v. 30). The coming devastation is worded as lamentation: instead of the joy and laughter associated with wine, there would be sorrow and wailing (vv. 31–33).

The theme of Moab's punishment is expanded in vv. 34–39 (cf. vv. 21–26, 31–33). The text is clearly influenced by Isaiah (15:4–6; 16:11–12), but the lament in Isaiah 16:11 resulted from the loss of the wine trade, while the lament here followed the cessation of idolatry. This adaptation of the material borrowed from Isaiah adds to the evidence that God's power and sovereignty were central to Jeremiah. An overwhelming outpouring of grief and lamentation is described. The last lines refer to the derision and dismay of Moab's neighbors at its fate.

48:40–47. Summary of the Message to Moab.

The prophecy ends with variants on previous themes: Moab was to be destroyed because it exalted itself against the Lord (v. 42; cf. v. 44). The references to dread, pit, and snare (v. 43) summarize a series of events in a movement from one danger to another, which indicate inescapability and hopelessness for Moab. The climax contains three motifs. First, Moab's destruction is illustrated by the fate of Heshbon, a center of power that was now powerless and devastated (v. 45). Second, a concluding woe (cf. v. 1) concerns the captivity of the worshipers of Chemosh (v. 46; cf. vv. 7, 13). Moab's defeat was to be, in effect, a defeat of Chemosh, who was not a god at all. Third, a promise of hope was to be fulfilled in the future (v. 47). Elsewhere, Jeremiah uses the phrase shub shebut for restoration after exile (cf. 29:14; 30:3, 18; 32:44; 33:11, 26). Even for Israel's enemy, there was hope, but only after exile. Thus, God's primary concern with Moab was not primarily its destruction but destruction as a means of establishing His sovereignty and turning Moab and the remnant of Israel in Moab to Himself. His response to their turning to Him would be mercy and a new life. From then on, the life of the nation would be founded on God's deliverance, as in the case of Israel's deliverance from Egypt.

God's purpose is to establish His rule over the nations as a condition for their well-being. He is the Lord of heaven and earth, and therefore, life cannot be preserved without Him, not even among the nations. Moab resisted the Lord's authority by trusting in its own works and treasures (48:7), by exalting itself at the Lord's expense (vv. 26, 42), by holding Israel up to ridicule (v.

27), and by its pride and arrogance (vv. 29–30). Such behavior was unacceptable, and Israel's God was in command of the nations and held them accountable. The prophecy sought to prove to Israel that they could trust such a God because He could reverse the fortunes of His remnant people in exile. In this regard, the prophecies against the nations in Jeremiah 46–51 were designed for the instruction of Israel.

49:1–6

Against Ammon

This prophecy consists of two units. Each unit is introduced by an indictment.

49:1–3. First Indictment. In the first indictment, which uses the metaphorical language of sons, heirs, and family rights (v. 1), Ammon was accused of taking land through military aggression. Israel had sons and heirs, so Malkam (also called "Milcom" or "Molek") had no right to occupy the land of Gad or dwell in the cities of Gad. As a result of the judgment for this crime (v. 2), Ammon would become a desolate mound, be burned down in a military attack, and Israel would dispossess those who had dispossessed them and reacquire their inheritance. This outcome would inspire hope that Judah's land, at this time occupied by the Babylonians, would one day be restored to its rightful owner. A call for wailing and mourning was to be made after Ammon's defeat, when Malkam would go into exile with his priests and princes (v. 3). Malkam was to have proven himself powerless at the intervention of Yahweh—again a tribute to the power of Israel's God.

49:4–6. Second Indictment. In the second indictment (v. 4), Ammon was accused of pride, boasting of her fertility, and trusting in her treasures by claiming that nobody could threaten her. But God would turn pride into fear (v. 5; cf. 48:43–44). All the people would be driven out of their land with no leader to gather them. Instead of the wailing mentioned in the first indictment, this section ends in a promise of Ammon's return to her land (49:6; cf. 48:47). Yahweh would demonstrate His sovereignty over Milcom when He punished the Ammonites for their aggressions and pride. The prophecy that the land of Gad would be restored to Israel created hope for a restoration of Judah. As the Ammonites came to understand that Israel's God ruled the nations, they would submit to Him and not to Milcom.

49:7–22*Against Edom

The Edomites, situated southeast of the Dead Sea, were descendants of Esau, the brother of Jacob/Israel (Gen. 36:1, 9). There is a verbal connection or dependence between vv. 9, 14–16 and Obadiah 1–5. Prophecies against Edom are common in the OT (Amos 1:11–12; Is. 21:11–12; 34:5–15; 63:1–6; Ezek. 25:12–14; 35:1–15; Obad. 1–21; Mal. 1:2–5). The passage in 49:19–21 is a variant of 50:44–46.

49:7–13. Images of Judgment. The judgment against Edom is presented in vivid language (vv. 7–13). First, through rhetorical questions, Edom was accused of having lost his famous sense of wisdom (cf. 1 Kin. 5:11; Obad. 5). Second, Edom was to flee the approaching disaster of Esau (Jer. 49:8; cf. 48:6–8, 28; 49:30; 50:8–10; 51:6, 45). Through synecdoche (a part representing the whole), this was addressed to the inhabitants of Dedan (an Arabian city southeast of Edom, or perhaps a settlement of Dedanites along the caravan route passing through Edom). The point was to warn Edom against the coming punishment.

Third, two images underline the rigor of the judgment (vv. 9–10). Grape gatherers would not pick the vines completely clean but would leave a portion for the gleaners (cf. Deut. 24:19–22). Thieves in the night would not take everything available—only what they needed. Both would leave something behind, but God would leave nothing in Edom because the nation would not survive. Fourth, the scene abruptly shifts to the innocent victims of the judgment, the orphans and widows (Jer. 49:11). In His mercy, God would care for them (cf. e.g., Ex. 22:22; Deut. 10:18; Ps. 68:5; Mal. 3:5). The covenant laws about caring for orphans and widows included leaving some grapes of the vineyards for them, and the reference to this law in Jeremiah 49:9 explains the content of v. 11: only the abandoned and defenseless would find rescue in the Lord.

Finally, in a prose summary of the judgment, God used the image of the cup of suffering and devastation (vv. 12–13; cf. 25:15–29). The punishment on Edom was as sure as God's oath. It was aimed first at Bozrah, the capital, which was to become a curse (cf. Deut. 28:37), and all the other cities were to become perpetual wastes.

49:14–16. The Pride of Edom. This unit contains a central indictment against Edom for trusting in his god and for his pride (v. 16), framed by judgment themes (vv. 14–16). God was mobilizing all the nations against Edom (v.

14), and they would despise him (v. 15). The people of Edom had been deceived by their god, the pride of their hearts. This god is referred to by the unusual Hebrew word tiplotset, which seems to be a by-form of mipletset (1 Kin. 15:13), some type of image or symbol dedicated to Asherah. Translations have rendered this word variously as “fierceness,” “terror,” or “horror” (nominative terms derived from the verb palats, “shudder,” “be horrified”). Figurines representing Astarte or some other fertility goddess have been found in Edom.

49:17–22. Metaphors of Defeat. The third and final unit returns to God's judgment against Edom, here expressed in three powerful metaphors (vv. 17–22). First, Edom's fall would be like that of Sodom and Gomorrah: no one would remain and dwell in it (vv. 17–18). Second, God was to be like a lion, attacking and devastating the flock of sheep in Edom (vv. 19–21), for no shepherd (king) in Edom could stand up to the Lord. Third, Edom's attacker would be like an eagle (v. 22), that is, threatening and terrorizing, making warriors quake like women in labor. Behind these images in Jeremiah stand God's power (v. 19) and intention (v. 20a). He would be the lion-God, sending the eagle-Babylon as His agent against Edom. The purpose of vv. 7–22 was to denounce Edom's pride and idolatry (i.e., not recognizing the sovereignty of God over the nations of the world). The passage reassured exiled Israel that Yahweh was indeed the most powerful God. He could not be defeated by any other god or nation. This was to assure Judah that God's promises of delivering His remnant were trustworthy.

49:23–27*Against Damascus

Damascus, Israel's northern neighbor, is a reference to all of Syria (cf. Is. 7:8), but Jeremiah also uses Hamath and Arpad to represent Syria as a nation (Jer. 49:23). The introductory terror and paralysis inflicted by judgment (vv. 23–24) are followed in the passage by a cry of lament by the inhabitants of Damascus that can also be read as a taunt from the prophet (v. 25). This section concludes with a harsh judgment in vv. 26–27. No formal indictment explains the punishment because the intended function of the prophecy was to remove every rival claim to historical-political power. Its message brought hope to Israel because it exalted Yahweh and His sovereignty over all nations, kings, and gods.

Against Kedar and Hazor

Kedar refers to Arabian tribes who were descendants of Ishmael (cf. Gen. 25:13) and lived in the desert (cf. Jer. 2:10). The eastern location of Hazor (not the famous city, north of the Sea of Galilee) is unknown, but the noun may mean “unwalled villages,” implying a nomadic form of life (cf. Jer. 49:31). The prophecy announced invasion and devastation (vv. 31–33) and explicitly mentioned Nebuchadnezzar as the agent (vv. 28, 30). The Lord gave a command mobilizing the enemies of Kedar and Hazor (vv. 28–29) and urged the inhabitants to escape to safety (v. 30). Nebuchadnezzar had conceived of a plan against Kedar and Hazor (v. 30), but he acted under the command of God (vv. 28, 31). Israel’s God would scatter the people and bring devastation upon them from every side (v. 32). The prophecy exalts God’s sovereign power over the nations, their kings, and their gods.

49:34–39

Against Elam

This prophecy against Elam, located east of Babylon, dates to Zedekiah’s reign (ca. 597 B.C.). Elam was once an ally of Babylon but later came under its control. It may symbolically represent the eastern nations subjugated by Babylon who would be liberated when Babylon fell. This prophecy forms a transition to the extensive prophecy against Babylon (50:1–51:58). Threats and judgments are worded in the first person, with the Lord as agent. The climax is God’s resolution to nullify the power and leaders of Elam by replacing them with His own direct rule (49:38). As in the cases of Egypt (46:26), Moab (48:47), and Ammon (49:6), God planned better days for Elam. He would bring back the captives of Elam and restore their fortunes (v. 39) when His throne was established in Elam and all other claims to power had been eradicated (v. 38). These are subtle hints to the exiled remnant of Israel that God would also bring them back home.

50:1—51:58

Against Babylon

The pattern followed in the prophecy against Babylon is the same as for other nations: the Lord called military forces against Babylon and declared her fall. While in the rest of the book Babylon is God’s agent for punishing the nations, in chapters 50–51 she is the object of God’s punishment. Since Babylon stood under judgment and would soon fall, trust in her as a lasting power was futile. These chapters support the promises of a return from the Babylonian Exile for the remnant of some nations (46:26; 48:47; 49:6, 39) and for Israel (e.g., 30:1–33:26), and they exhort Israel to trust God and wait for the fulfillment of His promises. The fall of Babylon had only been hinted at in previous passages (cf. 25:11–12, 26; 27:7).

The prophecy of the fall of Babylon is so certain that at times it is described as if it had already taken place (e.g., 51:8). God would intervene to punish the oppressor and to liberate His people. The danger of remaining in doomed Babylon and the necessity of avoiding complicity in Babylon’s guilt are used to persuade the remnant to make the right choice. The theme of God’s vengeance gains ground in this prophecy (i.e., God’s judgment is founded on the principle of retributive justice). This is particularly linked to His concern for Zion and for the restoration of the sanctuary and its services.

The theme of God’s vindication that runs throughout the book reaches its climax in chapters 50–51. The collapse of Babylon and her gods clearly demonstrates that the destruction of Jerusalem and the Lord’s temple was not the result of God’s impotence before the Babylonian gods. At this point, it was clear that He always had dominion over them. He had voluntarily, as a result of the sin of His people, handed the people, the city, and the temple into the hands of Babylon, but He—indeed, the Lord of Hosts—was now ready to take them back from her hand.

50:1–3. Introductory Message of Judgment.

(See “Content of Jeremiah Chapters 50 and 51,” p. 957). The introduction of this prophecy resembles the introduction in 1:1–3. In both instances, Jeremiah received the word of the Lord, and both concern the issue of the Exile in Babylon. Since the fall of Babylon had been announced, the end of the Exile was on the horizon (cf. Rev. 14:8). The content of this section of the message is very rich. There is an announcement among the nations of Babylon’s fall. The accumulation of six verbs for the act of proclamation underlines its importance. The fall was to include Babylon’s chief god, Bel, as well as Merodach (or Marduk). The passage refers to venerated idols that would be put to shame, terrorized, and shattered (cf. 50:38;

Content of Jeremiah Chapters 50 and 51

The structure of Jeremiah 50 and 51 has been a matter of discussion among scholars, and the result has been a significant number of organizational arrangements. The following is a useful breakdown of both chapters.

1. Content of Jeremiah 50. Jeremiah 50 has an introduction and a conclusion. The introduction (vv. 1–3) is a brief summary proclaiming the fall of Babylon and its gods, which is reiterated in vv. 45–46. The content of the rest of the chapter seems to be organized around those to whom God speaks. His messages appear here addressed to three groups: Israel, Babylon, and the enemy of Babylon. These three are clearly introduced in vv. 4–16: Israel (vv. 4–10), Babylon (vv. 11–13), and the enemy (vv. 14–16). In the next block of material, the addressees of the messages are Israel (v. 17), Babylon (v. 18), and Israel (vv. 19–20). The enemy is not mentioned, which indicates that the problem was between God, Israel, and Babylon. The messages begin and end with Israel as the addressee in order to show God's concern for His people.

The next section of the material is organized as follows: enemy (vv. 21–23), Babylon (vv. 24–25), and enemy (vv. 26–30). This time there is no message addressed to Israel because the main emphasis is on what God was doing to Babylon through the enemy from the north. The last section returns to the problem between Israel and Babylon: Babylon (vv. 31–32), Israel (vv. 33–34), and Babylon (vv. 35–46). The emphasis is on what God would do to Babylon on behalf of His people.

2. Content of Jeremiah 51. The organization of chapter 51 is difficult to establish. A helpful approach would be to focus on the speakers, namely, God and the prophet. There are five divine and four prophetic speeches. Through the interlocking of the speeches in this chapter, the destruction of Babylon is effectively announced.

The first divine speech (51:1–5) contains God's announcement of the coming judgment against Babylon. The first prophetic speech (vv. 6–19) contains two sections: one exhorting the people to leave Babylon, and another summoning the enemy of Babylon for war.

The second divine speech (vv. 20–26) is a confirmation of the previous prophetic one: the Lord at this time announcing that He would use the enemies of Babylon, the Medes, to punish Babylon. In the second prophetic speech (vv. 27–32), God's right to attack Babylon is justified based on His status as Creator and Sustainer of the world.

The third divine speech (v. 33) is the proclamation that the time to harvest Babylon was coming. The third prophetic speech (vv. 34–35) is in the form of a lament and includes a call for retribution on behalf of Israel.

The fourth divine speech (vv. 36–50) is God's response to the words of the people expressed by the prophet. The final (fourth) prophetic speech (v. 51) is a confession of the shame experienced by the people because of what Babylon had done to them.

The final (fifth) divine speech (vv. 52–58) is a response to the words of the prophet, culminating in the announcement of the total destruction of the city of Babylon.

51:17, 47, 52). Through the destruction of Babylon, Yahweh would assert His supremacy over the gods of Babylon, and He would completely undermine the idea that in the destruction of Jerusalem, the Babylonian gods had defeated Yahweh. The instrument of the downfall was to be a nation coming out of the north.

50:4–10. Message to Israel. The fall of Babylon was good news for all captives. God's people would return to Him and to Zion in an eternal covenant that was not to be forgotten (v. 5). This prophecy announced the unquestionable fulfillment of earlier promises (29:12–14; 31:31–33; 32:40). In the message, God's people are described as lost sheep misled by false shepherds. God laments over what the shepherds did to His people (i.e., kings or leaders; cf. 22:22; 23:1–4; Ezek. 34:1–10). Their priests and prophets had led them away from Him by encouraging them to worship other gods, thus causing them to forget their resting place (cf. Ps. 23). The indictment is against the leaders, particularly the royal establishment. As a result of being a lost sheep, Judah was devoured by Babylon. Apparently, Babylon claimed innocence at Judah's fate, blaming it on the sins of the people against their Lord, who was their abiding place of righteousness (Jer. 50:7). The remarkable balance between God's righteous judgments and His love for Israel indicates that the Babylonians understood, better than the kings of Israel did, the price to be paid for sin and the deep roots of hope in Israel's history. However, Babylon did what was in her heart to do, and it was inexcusable. It would have to assume responsibility for its action. This speech concludes with an admonition to Israel to leave Babylon (vv. 8–10), which should have prompted leaders to take action. The metaphor of rams is used to describe the strong leaders that Israel would need. The military threat that God would cause to overtake Babylon is described as a coalition of nations from the north (vv. 9–10; cf. 51:27–28).

50:11–16. Speeches to Babylon and the Enemy. Babylon's joy would turn into shame (vv. 11–13) for having gleefully taken advantage of Judah and recklessly plundering it. The superpower is derogatorily described as being like a heifer thrashing grain and bellowing like stallions (lit. "the mighty," sometimes translated as "bulls"; cf. 46:21). Babylon's abuse and self-serving exploitation would be judged by God. Babylon would become the least of the nations, and all passing by would hiss or whistle at her in derision (50:13; cf. 49:17, 33). The deep shame of the city ("mother") and her desolation would be caused by the indignation of the Lord (50:12–13; cf. 6:9–15).

In 50:14–16, the object of the speech is the enemy of Babylon. God was summoning armies against Babylon, for she had sinned against the Lord (v. 14; cf. v. 24). Subject to His vengeance, she would be punished according to the law of retributive justice: as she had done, so would be done to her (v. 15; cf. 50:28; 51:11, 24, 35–36, 49, 56). Babylon would surrender (lit. "give her hand"; 50:15). This expression could also refer to a broken covenant, perhaps to stave off destruction (cf. 2 Kin. 10:5; 1 Chr. 29:24; 2 Chr. 30:9; Lam. 5:6; Ezek. 17:18). The sower and the harvester would be cut off from the city, resulting in famine. Then everyone would turn to his own people and flee to his own land (Jer. 50:16).

50:17–20. Messages to Israel, Babylon, and Israel. The first message here is about Israel as a victim of political powers, and scattered throughout the nations (v. 17). But the Lord also addressed Babylon, announcing that He would punish her for her actions as He had done to Assyria. He then turned to His people and proclaimed that He would bring them back home. They are commanded to leave Babylon (vv. 17–20) and to return home (vv. 4–5, 8, 16b). This was to be the work of the Lord; He would reconcile with and forgive those whom He would preserve (v. 20; cf. 31:34). Israel's Good Shepherd would give them life, hope, and a place of rest (cf. 50:6–10).

50:21–30. Messages for the Enemy, Babylon, and the Enemy. God summoned the armies of the unidentified enemy of Babylon to attack and destroy her (vv. 21–23). The text now describes how God would deal with Babylon. Merathaim (in southern Babylon) and Pekod (Aramaean people on the eastern bank of the lower Tigris River) are used to represent the whole of Babylon. Merathaim may be linked with "the bitter river" in southern Babylonia, which was taken as a symbol of the outer edges of the earth, with Babylon at its center. Its ironic use here implies that the city, formerly the center of the world, would now be at the world's outer edges. Next, the Lord spoke about the fall of Babylon in a lament that continues this irony (vv. 23–24; cf. 49:25). Such an expression is that of Babylon as a hammer (which symbolized power and strength—cf. 23:29; 51:20–23) that has been cut down and smashed. Having fought against the Lord, Babylon was to face His judgment (50:24–25; cf. v. 14). What Babylon did against God's people was considered a sin against God Himself. The text returns to the topic of the enemies of Babylon, who were again summoned to punish and destroy her (vv. 26–27). Fugitives from Babylon (cf. vv. 8, 16, 19) would declare in Zion that God had repaid Babylon for what she did to the temple (v. 28; cf. v. 15; 51:11, 24, 35–36, 49, 56). Babylon's crime was proud defiance against the Holy One of Israel (50:29) and proven indifference to His authority, power, and status.

50:31–46. Messages for Babylon, Israel, and Babylon. The one who was to attack and punish Babylon was the Lord Himself (vv. 31–32). He would set the city on fire, and everything would be consumed. However, Israel and Judah, with Babylon's refusal to release their captives, had now a strong Redeemer defending their case who would liberate them and give rest to the land. He would disturb the inhabitants of Babylon (v. 34; cf. Rev. 14:9–11). The language in this section alludes to the deliverance from Egypt (cf. Ex. 2:23–25; 3:7–8; 6:6; 7:14; 15:13). Thus, a new exodus, this time from Babylon, was to be followed by a new covenant with the Lord (cf. Jer. 30:1–33:28; 50:4–5).

The last object of the discourse is Babylon. This section begins with an ode to a sword (vv. 35–38). The Lord's sword against Babylon (cf. v. 25) would impact every part of Babylonian society—princes, wise men, soothsayers, warriors, horses, chariots, mercenaries, and treasures. It would reduce everything to weakness, lifelessness, and instability. All of this was to happen because of their idolatry (v. 38), that is, the self-serving pride that had distanced Babylon from the God of heaven and earth.

Second, God would judge Babylon's pride (vv. 39–40). Because of her pride, Babylon would become a perennially desolate place. The symbols of human power and presence would disappear, and its inhabitants would be the wild animals of the desert. Its fate would be like Sodom and Gomorrah. God's judgment would come from the north, from a great nation allied with many kings from the ends of the earth. Verses 41–43 reiterate 6:22–24, with the essential difference being that Babylon is no longer the attacker (vv. 22–24) but the attacked (50:40–43; there is also a parallel between vv. 44–46 and 49:19–21). Again, the inversion of fates was to be complete. God (not Babylon) would rule the world, and there is none like Him (v. 44b).

51:1–19. First Divine and Prophetic Speeches. (See "Content of Chapters Jeremiah 50 and 51," p. 957) In His first speech, God expressed His resolve to destroy Babylon (vv. 1–4). He would raise up a destroyer against Babylon, who is here called "Leb Kamai," "the heart of those who raise up against me." A destructive ruakh, "spirit" or "wind," would winnow and destroy the land. At the same time, He would comfort Israel and Judah (v. 5). In spite of their sins, God had not forsaken His people, and the fall of Babylon would demonstrate this. The first part of the prophetic speech is an admonition to God's people to abandon Babylon and to worship God in Zion (vv. 6–10). Thus they would save themselves from God's judgment against Babylon (v. 6). The common practice of using balm for pain and healing would be ineffective for Babylon: she could not be healed because her judgment would reach to the skies or "the heavens," literally, "the clouds" (v. 9). Here, "judgment" (mishpat) may, as in other cases (Deut. 19:6; 21:22; Ezek. 7:23), refer to "guilt," and the idea of something reaching the clouds or heaven could mean that it has no end (cf. 2 Chr. 28:9; Job 20:6; Pss. 57:11; 108:5; Dan. 4:22). The remnant of Israel would realize that God had vindicated them (lit. "brought out" or "revealed" their righteousness), and therefore they were to worship Him in Zion (Jer. 51:10; cf. 50:5). The righteousness of Israel (cf. vv. 4–5) was totally dependent on the mercy and grace of God, their pardoner (cf. v. 20; 51:5). In forsaking Babylon, the people were not only to escape judgment but also to show no complicity in Babylon's crimes (cf. Rev. 18:4).

In the second part of the prophetic speech, the Medes are summoned against Babylon (51:11–14). God had taken an oath to destroy Babylon (v. 14) as vengeance for His temple (v. 11; cf. 50:15, 24, 28; 51:24, 35–36, 49, 51, 56). The prophet proceeds to contrast the Lord with Babylon's idols (vv. 15–19) in order to demonstrate His right to judge Babylon. This unit is parallel to 10:12–16. It celebrates God's power by contrasting it with the powerlessness of the idols lacking "breath" (i.e., life). The superiority of Israel's God asserted Israel's special status.

51:20–35. Second and Third Divine and Prophetic Speeches. In His second speech, God expresses again His resolution to destroy Babylon (vv. 20–26). The structure of this unit is similar to 50:35–38. Commentators have differed over the identity of the referent in 51:20–23. According to some, it is Israel, due to the immediately preceding verses; others believe it is Babylon (in light of 50:23, 51:25, and vv. 13–14, where Babylon is addressed as "you" a few verses before this section, starting in v. 20). According to others, and most likely, it is the kingdom of the Medes (vv. 11; 41–46). Babylon's social structure would be destroyed as retribution for all the wickedness they had perpetrated in Zion (v. 24; see vv. 11, 51). The prophetic speech was a summons for the nations to come to attack Babylon (vv. 27–29), and it recorded the reaction of the Babylonians (vv. 29–32).

The third divine speech announced that the time for the harvest of Babylon would come. Babylon would become like a threshing floor—its pride and honor would be trampled (v. 33). The Judean exiles were encouraged to remain confident in God's purpose and to wait faithfully until the Lord's soon-coming harvest. In the third prophetic speech, the prophet appropriates a lament of the people concerning Babylon's abuse of Jerusalem (vv. 34–35). He accuses Nebuchadnezzar of deporting the people and swallowing the city like a tannin (“serpent,” “dragon,” “sea monster”), a symbol of chaos and evil. Blood-guilt is assigned to the Babylonian king. His state policy was regarded by the victims as murder. This is an enormous allegation that cannot go unpunished. The principle of retributive justice is therefore adduced (v. 35).

51:36–50. Fourth Divine Speech. God responded to the lament of vv. 34–35 by pleading Zion’s case and taking vengeance for her (v. 36a). He would dry up Babylon’s water and would make her completely desolate, a home for jackals. God would provide banquets for them and make them drunk and merry until they would sleep and not awaken (v. 39). Through the attackers, He would slaughter the Babylonians and render them helpless, like sacrificial animals (v. 40). God here introduced the topic of reversal (vv. 41–44). A complete reversal would come to the city (vv. 40, 44)—the glory of Babylon would be turned into desolation and derision (v. 41; for “Sheshach,” cf. 25:26). Her devastation was to be like a violent flood (51:42). Her cities—once filled with people, bustling life, and treasures—would be deserted (v. 43). God would punish Bel, the god of Babylon, and would liberate the captives he had “swallowed” (i.e., conquered, killed, and exiled). The nations that formerly praised Babylon’s glory (v. 41) would no longer nahar ’el. This has been translated “stream to him,” which would imply the streaming of nations in their masses to Bel and his city. However, in chapters 50–51, Bel is shamed by the nations attacking Babylon (50:2–3, 9; 51:27–28). As in 31:12, nahar can be understood in 51:44 as “shine” (i.e., look with favor or favorably toward). The acclamation of a great ruler traditionally involved greeting him with joy or “shining faces,” and v. 44 could imply that the nations would no longer “look favorably toward” Bel.

Babylon would be defenseless, and its famous and secure walls would fall (v. 44). God would demonstrate His supremacy over the Babylonian gods by punishing the city. Babylon would no longer command the respect of the nations; it would not receive tax, allegiance, or praise. Babylon was to fall (50:32; 51:44). This implies a message of hope for exiled Israel and desolate Zion. At this time, the Lord admonished Israel to abandon Babylon (vv. 45–46; see v. 6). God’s anger was no longer directed toward His apostate people but toward the oppressor who was preventing the fulfillment of His plan to bring His people to the promised land. Endless rumors of violence and intrigue could create fear, but the exiles were admonished to trust in the Lord and avoid the impending judgment by fleeing Babylon (v. 46).

Another reason to abandon Babylon was God’s judgment of her false gods (v. 47). The land would be ashamed, and the people would die in her midst. While the nations had looked favorably toward Bel in Babylon (v. 44), the heavens, the earth, and all in them would at this time sing with joy at the demise of the oppressor (v. 48). Babylon’s bloodguilt for killing God’s people would be avenged through retributive justice. The exiled remnant was admonished again by the Lord to leave Babylon (cf. 50:8–10, 11–13, 14–16; 51:6, 45), with the instruction to keep the Lord and Jerusalem in mind (v. 50) as they were traveling.

51:51–58. Fourth Prophetic and Fifth Divine Speeches. The fourth prophetic speech is a short confession voicing the shame of Judah that had been brought on by the Babylonians (v. 51). This could have been another reason to leave Babylon and return to Jerusalem to restore the temple services. In vv. 11 and 24, Jeremiah expressed concern regarding Zion and the temple. Here, in v. 51, the reason for abandoning Babylon is that the temple had been profaned. In His final speech, the Lord responded to the shaming of Judah by announcing that the judgment against Babylon’s gods was inescapable (vv. 52–53; cf. v. 47). Nothing would stop those who sought to plunder Babylon, not even if Babylon reach up to heaven (cf. Gen. 11:1–9). These prophecies seek to persuade the remnant of Israel to prepare for their return home.

The Lord announced that Babylon would be destroyed by plunderers (Jer. 51:54–58). He is a God of retribution, and He would certainly repay the nation completely (v. 56). The sovereignty of the Lord and the principle of retributive justice come together. God’s resolve was to make drunk (i.e., punish; v. 39) all representatives of Babylonian society (v. 57) to cause them to fall into a perpetual sleep. This was the decision of the King, the Sovereign Lord.

Verse 58 summarizes the chapter’s divine speeches against Babylon. Babylon’s substantial walls would be destroyed and her high gates incinerated (v. 58). The collapse of Babylon demonstrates the futility of the peoples’ labor (in building and defending their broad walls and high gates). Verse 58b parallels Habakkuk 2:12–13, though with some differences. What Habakkuk says generally about the ongoing works of the Babylonians, Jeremiah applies specifically to the future fall of Babylon. Jeremiah draws a lesson for the nations: they all labored and exhausted themselves in futility and would be destroyed by fire. Implied is a contrast between the nations and God's people, who would find "rest" for their souls (6:16). By dwelling in the land with the Lord, they would find their "resting place" (50:6; cf. 30:10; 31:2; 46:27; 50:34).

51:59–64

Jeremiah's Command to Seraiah

This short narrative dramatically underlines, by word and acted parable, the content, seriousness, and intentionality of the prophecy about the fall of Babylon (50:1–51:58). Jeremiah had written this prophecy against Babylon on a scroll and asked Seraiah son of Neriah, who was possibly Baruch's brother (cf. 45:5), to be his representative. As one of the king's staff officers, Seraiah accompanied King Zedekiah to Babylon (ca. 593 B.C.).

The life of the scroll had three parts: (1) Its preparation was completed by Jeremiah, who wrote it himself (51:60). (2) Its administration was managed by Seraiah. He was instructed to take it to Babylon, read it publicly (cf. chaps. 32, 36), and invoke the Lord's resolve to destroy Babylon (51:61–62). (3) Its deposition (vv. 63–64) was a formal and public act that symbolically linked the content of the prophecy against Babylon with the geography of Babylon (cf. 13:3–11). The scroll, with its prophecy describing the future of Babylon, became a symbol for the city itself. Thus, its "drowning" in the river was intended as a prophecy that Babylon would be overwhelmed. As history would reveal, the Euphrates and its engineered manipulation by Cyrus played a key role in the city's destruction.

God's word stands and will be fulfilled, but Babylon would sink to its death, and its fall would be permanent. God's sovereignty is sure. As repeatedly underscored in 50:1–51:58, this message was to bring hope and resolution to the remnant, saying, "Rely on God's plans for you. Break away from Babylon, and become a part of God's future for Israel!"

The reference to weariness or exhaustion in the last word of the prophecy (51:58; some render it as "fall") could apply literally to the walls of Babylon or to the nations that behave like her. It translates one single word in Hebrew (ya'ap) and resumes the theme that the nations—even the impressive historic Babylon—labor for nothing if their lives are not submitted to the King, the Sovereign Lord (v. 57). This is a vital message for God's people, for unless they know God and acknowledge Him as the Lord of their lives, all their labor is in vain. The message of the fall of Babylon is a call to rely on God's plans and to break away from Babylon to become a part of God's future for Israel (cf. Rev. 14:6–12).

Chapter 51 ends with a note that Jeremiah's words end here. Thus the book essentially closes where it began, with a reference to the words of Jeremiah. (1:1; 51:64). The phrase indicates that what follows in chapter 52 was added to the book but was not written by Jeremiah.

52:1–34

HISTORICAL EPILOGUE

This chapter confirms the fulfillment of Jeremiah's prophecies regarding Judah's punishment. It also provides a necessary background for the promissory words to the exiles in Babylon, with encouragement to them to remain faithful and wait for the return to their homeland (30:1–33:28). In relation to the prophecy against Babylon in 50:1–51:58, chapter 52 balances God's opposition against Babylon and removes any doubt that He would relent in His resolve to punish Judah. The material in chapter 52 (except vv. 28–30) derives from historical biblical sources (2 Kin. 24:18–25:30) and does not mention Jeremiah. The story about Gedaliah in 2 Kings 25:22–26 is found in Jeremiah 40:7–41:18. The unit in 52:1–11 partially overlaps with 39:1–10.

52:1–23

The Fate of Zedekiah and Fall of the City

Zedekiah (597–586 B.C.) is said to have done evil in the Lord's estimation and is compared to King Jehoiakim (609–598 B.C.). The gruesome fate of Judah and Jerusalem is blamed on Zedekiah, who was thrown away from God's presence. The account of the events begins with Zedekiah's rebellion against Nebuchadnezzar (v. 3b). Nebuchadnezzar's punitive invasion (vv. 4–10) is addressed in the notes on 39:1–10 (cf. also 2 Kin. 25:1–7).

Here, the reckoning of time shifts to the chronology of Nebuchadnezzar, Judah's new ruler (12–23). The siege of Jerusalem began in January 588 B.C. and lasted eighteen months. Three things are reported from the conquest: (a) a great destruction of the temple, the walls, and many houses (vv. 13–14); (b) a massive deportation (v. 15); and (c) some people who cared for the vineyards and the fields were left in the land (v. 16). The report becomes more detailed. The taking of the vessels of the temple meant a loss of honor for the God who resided there. There are also hints at how the plunder signifies the end of the Davidic dynasty and the historical splendor of Jerusalem since Solomon (v. 20).

52:24–30

The People Taken to Babylonia

The occupation included the seizure and execution of leading citizens. The deportations from 597 to 582 B.C. are listed, with the number of exiles (vv. 28–30) totaling four thousand six hundred. The actual number may have been considerably higher since this figure may cover only the heads of households. This compact list of Nebuchadnezzar's three acts of deportation is absent from the historical source material and is found only here in the OT (for the deportation in 598 B.C., see also 2 Kin. 24:15–16). This underscores the fact that "exile" is central in the book of Jeremiah. The deportations in Jeremiah 52:28–30 give a sense of completeness and finality to the prophecies of Jeremiah. The punitive concept of being thrown out from the presence of God (v. 3a) looms over this brief unit.

52:31–34

Jehoiachin Released from Prison

This unit is chronologically removed from the fall of Jerusalem (cf. 2 Kin. 25:27–30). The last date in Jeremiah 52:30 is 582 B.C.; here in v. 31, it is 560 B.C. Jehoiachin or Coniah (22:24–30), the young king brought to Babylon in 597 B.C., was still alive and recognized as king after thirty-seven years (commentators and translators differ over whether the Heb. shemoneh, "eight," for Jehoiachin's age in 2 Chr. 36:9 is an error that should be corrected to shemoneh 'esreh, "eighteen," in light of 2 Kin. 24:8). His new Babylonian master, Nebuchadnezzar's son Evil-Merodach (562–560 B.C.), befriended him and treated him honorably. Extrabiblical records confirm that Jehoiachin and his family received regular rations of oil and barley during their captivity in Babylon.

Is this simply a report of historical events, or does it have a theological point? Although Jehoiachin ruled only a few months before his deportation (2 Chr. 36:9–10), he was a special royal exile (cf. Jer. 22:24–30; 24:1; 29:1–2). Given the threat of the extinction of the Davidic line, this paragraph may have given a feeble hope for its continuation (cf. the promises in 23:5–8; 33:15–18), even though Jehoiachin would die in Babylon (22:26–27). A note in 1 Chronicles 3:19 makes Zerubbabel ("seed of Babylon") the grandson of Jehoiachin, and according to Ezra 2:1–3:13 (cf. Neh. 7:6–73), he and the high priest Joshua led the return from Babylon and the restoration of the temple. In some of Jeremiah's prophecies, it is stated that God would not completely destroy His people (Jer. 4:27; 5:10, 18; 46:28), and the note on Jehoiachin may serve to confirm this assurance. Thus, the theme that runs throughout the book of Jeremiah—of hope in the midst of a hopeless condition—closes the book.

LAMENTATIONS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. In Hebrew, the book of Lamentations is referred to as 'ekah, a cry of exclamation meaning “how,” which is the first word in the Hebrew text. It also occurs at the beginnings of chapters 2 and 4. The book was also known among the Jews as qinot (“lamentations”) on the basis of its contents. As in the case of many biblical books, the author is anonymous. The traditional view is that Jeremiah wrote it. This tradition is quite solid and goes back to the second century B.C., to the Greek translation (LXX), which introduces the book, saying “And it came to pass after Israel had been carried away captive and Jerusalem had become desolate that Jeremiah sat down weeping and lamented this lamentation over Jerusalem, saying....” This tradition is confirmed both by Jewish and early Christian traditions. It is also supported by biblical data. Second Chronicles 35:25 reports that Jeremiah sang lamentations for Josiah that were found in the qinot (the Laments). The reference may not be to the book of Lamentations, for the only king who is specifically mentioned in it is Zedekiah (4:20). It is clear, however, that Jeremiah wrote some lamentations.

The book of Lamentations uses expressions that parallel those found in Jeremiah, particularly when dealing with similar subjects (e.g., Lam. 3:14, 48–49 // Jer. 9:1; 20:7 // Lam. 5:16; 3:42 // Jer. 14:7; Lam. 3:52–56 // Jer. 12:9; 37:16; 38:6). Also, the personal sufferings described in Lamentations 3:14, 48–57, and 61–63 are similar to those of Jeremiah. There is no legitimate reason to reject the traditional view of Jeremiah as the author.

Date. It is generally agreed that Lamentations was written shortly after the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C., before Jeremiah was forced to join his contemporaries as they traveled to Egypt (Jer. 43:1–7). It was probably written no later than 580 B.C., while the memory of the events described was still fresh in his mind.

Backgrounds. The previous twenty years in Judah were politically turbulent. Babylon in the north and Egypt in the south competed for the control of the strategically located Judah. Upon the death of King Josiah in 609 B.C., the people of Judah placed his son Jehoahaz on the throne (2 Kin. 23:30). Three months later, the Egyptians invaded, deposed him, took him captive to Egypt, and replaced him with his older brother Eliakim, whom they renamed Jehoiakim (2 Kin. 23:34). They also imposed a heavy fine on the land.

In 605 B.C., the Babylonians took several individuals captive to Babylon, among them Daniel and his three friends. King Jehoiakim reluctantly submitted to the Babylonians. Following a confrontation between Babylon and Egypt in 601 B.C., in which Babylon was apparently defeated, Jehoiakim openly defied Babylon (2 Kin. 24:1). Jeremiah strongly advised him against rebelling and encouraged him to submit to Babylon instead. But the king and his advisers saw these messages as evidence of treason and responded accordingly by oppressing Jeremiah.

On December 19, 598 B.C., the Babylonians returned to Judah, besieged the city of Jerusalem, and captured Jehoiakim (2 Chr. 36:6). But before he could be deported, he either died or was killed (cf. Jer. 22:18–19), and his son Jehoiachin took his place on the throne. Three months later, on March 16, 597 B.C., the city fell and the king surrendered (2 Kin. 24:12). Leading citizens and ten thousand captives (including the Prophet Ezekiel) were taken to Babylon, along with the treasures of the king's house (vv. 12–13). The king of Babylon made Jehoiachin's uncle, Mattaniah, king in his place and changed Mattaniah's name to Zedekiah (v. 17). He proved to be a weak leader, unable to stand up to his nobles (Jer. 38:4–6). Even though he owed his allegiance to Nebuchadnezzar, he ventured to rebel against him at a time when fierce, but misguided, patriotism pushed Judah into open and irrevocable rebellion.

On January 15, 588 B.C., Jerusalem was again under a siege that lasted eighteen months (2 Kin. 25:1; Jer. 52:4). As the city was about to fall, Zedekiah wished to surrender but lacked the courage to do so. When the walls were breached, Zedekiah and his soldiers snuck out of the city into the night but were captured near Jericho (for more on the chronological issues with dating the fall of Jerusalem, see "Old Testament Timeline," p. 94). After seeing his sons killed before his eyes, Zedekiah was blinded, chained, and brought to Babylon (2 Kin. 25:7; Jer. 52:9–11). A month later, Nebuzaradan, one of Nebuchadnezzar's captains, set fire to the city and broke down its walls (2 Kin. 25:8–12). Most of the Jews were deported to Babylon, with only some of the poorest left behind. These events marked the end of the kingdom of Judah and form the background to the book of Lamentations.

Theology and Purpose. The book is primarily a poetic reflection precipitated by the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. It is about the experience of national disaster and the place of the nation in God's overall plan for His people. The reflection faces the pain of a loss and the possibility of hope for the future. The book opens with a sense of divine abandonment and the sense of loneliness that comes with it. The city that had been full of people became isolated and desolate (Lam. 1:1). Without God in our lives, we are indeed alone. The book ends with hope and a prayer that the divine abandonment of the city would not be final (5:21–22).

1. A Painful Sense of Loss. Almost everything that had characterized Israel's place among the nations was gone—the Davidic kingship, the priesthood, the temple with its services, and even the land itself. Three hundred and fifty years of the nation's independence had come to an end. For some, it was inconceivable that such a thing could happen to God's special people. More than a thousand years earlier, God had called Abraham to be the father of His people in order to make them a visual evidence of the blessings of serving Him. This election was reiterated at the time of the Exodus (Ex. 19:5–6). The blessings of obedience and the curses for failure are summarized in Deuteronomy 28 (cf. Lev. 26). The people quickly became accustomed to expecting only God's rich blessings that were promised within the covenant. They gradually lost sight of their responsibilities as covenant partners with God and of the conditional nature of the covenant promises. Consequently, they suffered the curses of the covenant. A reliance on the external aspects of their faith, without an underlying heart commitment, ultimately brought them to their ruin (cf. Jer. 7:3–7).

2. The Cause of the Loss. In Lamentations, the prophet expresses his understanding of the destruction of Jerusalem as the deserved consequence of Judah's sins (1:5, 8, 14–15, 18, 20, 22; 3:42; 4:3; 5:7, 16). The priests and prophets, who should have warned and guided the people, failed them. Instead of warning the nation against iniquity and transgression, they proclaimed peace and prosperity, thereby giving the people a false sense of security (see Jer. 8:8, 11; Lam. 2:14). They even took part in spilling the blood of the righteous (4:13). The temple, which represented God's presence among His people (Ex. 25:8; Lev. 26:12), had been desecrated and destroyed. This came as a shock to the people, who had assumed that God would miraculously protect His sacred meeting place (Lam. 2:15; 4:12) from their enemies. Jeremiah, however, was well aware of the fact that the disaster was a direct fulfillment of the predicted consequences of departing from God's ways, as listed in Deuteronomy 28. Given that sin was the cause for the disaster, God's decision to hand His people over to the enemy was considered to be just and right.

The poet and the faithful among God's people ultimately admitted their sinfulness and recognized God's justice. But they also appealed to God to avenge them of their enemies. This attitude can best be understood in light of the so-called imprecatory psalms, which are prayers for a curse on one's enemies, who were seen to be the enemies of God Himself (e.g., Ps. 37:20; 137; see "Imprecatory Passages in the Psalms," p. 733).

3. Hope as the Solution to the Riddle. Chapter 3 is the theological center of the book. It was difficult for the exiles to understand that belonging to God and being His special people meant more than having a superficial religious experience. They had lost sight of the true essence of religion: doing justice, loving mercy, and walking humbly with God (Mic. 6:8). The central section of the book (Lam. 3:21–42) gives the theological solution to the riddle of the disaster. God had warned the nation not to forget Him in times of prosperity (Deut. 8:10–20). If they failed, He would discipline them. This should not, however, be seen as a rejection but rather as a means of bringing them back to Him. Human experience has demonstrated that it is easier to remember God in hard times than in prosperity. It is often when we are in our deepest despair that we come closest to God and remember that the Lord is the one who provides salvation (Jon. 2:9).

Thus, the author challenged the nation to remember how they had experienced the Lord's steadfast loving-kindness in the past: it had never failed but was "new every morning" (Lam. 3:23). Remembering God's loving-kindness awakens hope in the midst of despair (vv. 21–23). After declaring that all he had hoped for was gone (v. 18), the prophet found new hope in the memory of God's loving acts of salvation in the past. Hope looks forward without losing sight of the saving work of God in the past. In fact, the two are inseparable. This is particularly clear in the message of hope found in the NT. It is grounded on the cross of Jesus—the past—and yet patiently waits for the return of the Lord in glory. Since in Lamentations remembrance brings hope, Judah's punishment, far from being an indicator of final rejection, was for the purpose of restoration. God is in control, and He promises that everything will ultimately work together for the good of those who love Him (Rom. 8:28).

It has been noted that Lamentations outlines the steps for processing grief. Difficulties are not denied. The pains and grief over the destruction and ruined dreams are openly acknowledged. This is indispensable to the healing process. The detailed listing of specific events and situations, along with the confession of sins, is an important part of the process of dealing with grief. Jeremiah wrestles with the thought of God causing this disaster and at the same time sees Him as the source of comfort, hope, and help. It is comforting to have the assurance of God's unfailing compassion and faithfulness. At the end, Jeremiah felt safe turning the situation over to Him in prayer, confident that He would do what was in the best interest of everyone involved.

Literary Features. The literary structure of Lamentations is somewhat unique. It consists of five poems/chapters, each one structured on the basis of the Hebrew alphabet. The first four chapters are acrostic—that is, the first line of each stanza or verse begins with a consecutive letter of the alphabet, with a few variations. Scholars agree that this is by design, but they have debated the specific purpose of the acrostics. Some see the structure as a memory device, and others think it may be part of a liturgical ritual. Though no specific reasons are given, the choice may indicate the poet's interest in literary beauty. Unfortunately, this literary feature is lost in translation.

The book belongs to a literary type called a lament. A characteristic feature of laments is the expression of a great loss with a vivid contrast between past glory and present misery. Laments may also express the community's despair over its misfortunes and sorrow for its wrongs (Jer. 22:18; Ezek. 19:1–14; 26:17–18).

It has been proposed that the five laments that form this book follow a chiasmic arrangement, also referred to as inverted parallelism (these terms refer to a literary structure arranged in an ABCBA pattern, in which the most important idea/concept is in the center; e.g., Is. 45:5–6). Accordingly, chapters 1 and 5 present a general description of the scenes of misery. Chapters 2 and 4 further illustrate the people's sufferings, their enemies, and God's wrath. The central and longest chapter (chap. 3) views the people's suffering in the context of their understanding of God. Even though He is punishing them, He is not capricious—He is acting in righteousness. Several speakers are present in these laments, one of whom is identified by various titles, such as "the daughter of Zion"/"Daughter Zion"/"Judah"/"Jerusalem"/"my people"/"the widow Jerusalem." In chapter 1, Jeremiah bemoans the disaster that struck the "daughter of Zion"/"Daughter Zion" (Lam. 1:1–11, 17) and she also expresses grief over her fate (vv. 12–16, 18–22). In chapter 2, the prophet again mourns over the city's misfortunes (2:1–9), tries to console her (vv. 10–17), and calls on her to lament (vv. 18–19), which she does (vv. 20–22). In chapter 4, Jeremiah again weeps over the city (4:1–16), and her inhabitants likewise bewail their fate (vv. 17–20). Then the poet proclaims punishment for Edom and salvation for Zion (vv. 21–22). In chapter 5, the community takes up the lament.

The identity of the speakers in chapter 3 has puzzled some scholars. Jeremiah speaks of his sufferings at the hand of the Lord (3:1–18), then expresses his hope for deliverance (vv. 19–24) and challenges the sufferer to trust in a just and compassionate Lord (vv. 25–39). Then the community breaks into lament (vv. 40–47). The speakers grieve Zion's fall (vv. 48–51) and give thanks for the Lord's deliverance (vv. 52–58). The poem comes to an end with the community's prayer for deliverance (vv. 59–66).

C O M M E N T A R Y

1:1–22

Zion: A City in Shambles

Jeremiah and the city itself reflect on the fate of Zion. The present condition of the city is described in contrast to her former glory and beauty (1:1–11). What they are experiencing is profoundly painful. The prophet expresses his deep need for comfort but acknowledges that there is none (vv. 12–17). They are experiencing the Lord's affliction. In the last section (vv. 18–22), the prophet recognizes the guilt of the people and prays for God's intervention against their enemies.

1:1–11. The City's Destruction. The city was deserted and lonely like a widow (v. 1). The same image is found on a victory medal issued by Titus when the temple was destroyed in A.D. 70: a woman weeping beneath a palm tree, with the inscription Judaea capta ("Judah captured"). Once full of people (Is. 1:21; 1 Sam. 2:5), it had become empty (Lam. 1:1; cf. Jer. 4:23–26). "Her lovers" (Lam. 1:2) is a reference to those who tempted her into alliance against the Babylonians (Jer. 27:3). They had turned against her, and therefore there was no one to help or comfort her (Lam. 1:2, 7, 9, 16–17, 21). Once a prestigious hub of activity, she had been reduced to the status of a slave (v. 3; cf. Deut. 12:10). Once her roads had resounded with the songs of rejoicing as pilgrims flocked to the city for the appointed festivals (Pss. 48; 122–134), but now, the prophet said, the roads to Zion mourned (Lam. 1:4). The gates, which had regularly been the center of important activities (Deut. 21:19; Ruth 4:1, 11; 2 Sam. 19:8; 1 Kin. 22:10), were now desolate (Lam. 1:4). How incredible that this could have happened to the great city of Jerusalem!

Even God Himself seemed to have turned against her because of her rebellions (v. 5). As a result, the splendor had departed from the daughter of Zion (v. 6), and she felt like a widow, sitting alone. Throughout the book, Jeremiah refers to the city in endearing terms, such as "the (virgin) daughter (of) Zion" (e.g., "the daughter of my people"), "the (virgin) daughter (of) Judah" (e.g. v. 5; 2:5), and "the daughter (of) Jerusalem" (e.g. vv. 13, 15). Jerusalem was remembering all of its precious things from the days of old (1:7). The city had been renowned for her beauty and great treasures from the time of King Solomon (1 Kin. 6:21–35; 10:11–25), but as a result of various invasions by foreign powers, these had been stripped away and removed (2 Kin. 18:15–16).

The relationship between God and His people is most frequently seen as a marriage (cf. Deut. 29:12–13; Jer. 31:32). Unfaithfulness to God is seen as a breach of that relationship and is, therefore, often expressed in terms which imply sexual immorality. Those who despised her saw her nakedness (Lam. 1:8), and there was filthiness or uncleanness in her skirts (v. 9). Now, other nations had come into her sanctuary (v. 10). The term goyim, "nations," is almost exclusively used for pagan nations. Ammonites and Moabites were not to enter the assembly, much less the temple (Deut. 23:3–4). As a result of the attack against the city, Gentiles had entered the holy precincts (2 Kin. 24:2; Ps. 70:1; 74:3–7). The siege, which lasted eighteen months, drained the city's food rations (Lam. 1:11; cf. Deut. 28:17, 38–42; Jer. 52:6). The people were forced to barter away their valuables in order to obtain bread to eat (Lam. 1:11).

1:12–17. A Plea for Comforters. In this section, Jerusalem reflects on her fate and acknowledges it as the direct result of her own rebellion (vv. 14, 20, 22). Even though she complained about her harsh treatment at the hands of the Lord through the actions of her enemies, she did not blame Him. She recognized that He is righteous (v. 18) and that she deserved her sentence though the experience was difficult to bear.

The city searched for someone to comfort her in the midst of her sorrow, but people passed by and did not show sympathy (v. 12). The only one who could comfort her was the Lord, but He felt distant (v. 16). In fact, He was inflicting the punishment. In the aftermath of the disaster, the city had time to assess the situation and its causes. She realized that the Lord had brought this upon her on the day of His fierce anger (v. 12). All of her boasting had vanished, and she was like a captive animal because of her transgressions. Divine wrath is always a response to human sin. After realizing that the Lord had called for a mo'ed—the word used for Israel's festivals here designates "an appointed time" (which is sometimes translated in Lamentations as "assembly" or "army")—against her (v. 15), she wondered if there were any pain or suffering like hers (v. 12). In spite of God's mercy, there comes a time when humans reap what they have sown. The winepress is a graphic picture of God's judgment (v. 15). Grapes were put into a stone trough and then trampled in order to release their juice. Neither the children (v. 16) nor the elders and priests (v. 19) escaped the destruction. The nation had been forewarned by the Prophet Jeremiah (Jer. 19:8).

1:18–22. Admission of Guilt and Plea for Revenge on Enemies. In this section, the city admits her wrongdoing three times (vv. 18, 20, 22) and pleads with the Lord not to overlook the cruelty of her enemies (vv. 20–22; cf. Deut. 32:35). She expected her lovers to help and comfort her, but they showed no interest (Lam. 1:19, 21). She now realized how pointless it is to rely on human strength. Sin brings with it a deep sense of loneliness and abandonment. She prayed that the Lord might avenge her of her enemies (cf. Ps. 37:20; 137:1–9). Instead of seeking to implement her own vengeance, she surrendered it to the Lord and asked Him to act on her behalf.

2:1–22

God, the Destroyer of Zion

Chapter 2 further clarifies the nature of the disaster that had struck Zion. It emphasizes God's anger against Zion (vv. 1–14), the suffering of the city and the attitude of her enemies (vv. 15–17), and ends with an appeal to God for compassion in the form of a lament (vv. 18–22). The main emphasis of the chapter is on the fact that the Lord Himself had caused the destruction of the city, thereby assigning no supreme power to her enemies. What happened was not their doing, but the Lord's, because of the people's unfaithfulness.

2:1–14. God's Anger against Zion. Verse 1 introduces two topics that will be further developed in the first nine verses of the chapter: God's action against the city (v. 1a; developed in vv. 2–5, 8–9) and the destruction of the temple, His footstool (v. 1b; developed in vv. 6–7). This is followed by a description of the reaction of the elders and the prophet to the fall of the city (vv. 10–13), concluding with a charge against false prophets (v. 14). God's anger against the nation is mentioned five times in vv. 1–6. In His anger, He destroyed the city by throwing down the beauty and splendor of Israel from heaven to earth (v. 1)—hyperbolic language of total defeat, most likely emphasizing the magnitude of the fall (cf. Prov. 25:3). God's footstool refers to the temple (cf. Ps. 99:5; 132:7). God had destroyed the houses, the strongholds of the city, and the princes (Lam. 2:2). God's anger is compared to a fire that devours everything (v. 3). The Lord had also been likened to a warrior fighting against Zion (v. 4). He had become the enemy of Judah, destroying the palaces and the strongholds, and leaving behind Him increased or multiplied mourning and lamentation (v. 5). But above all, the Lord destroyed the tabernacle, His dwelling (vv. 6–7), the outward symbol of His presence among His people (cf. Jer. 22:5; Ezek. 9:3; 10:4, 18–19; 11:23; Matt. 23:38). The religious festivities associated with the temple—the appointed festivals and sabbaths—had come to an end. The king, who was responsible for protecting the temple, and the priests, who were responsible for ministering in it, had been removed (Lam 2:6). The sacred precincts had been profaned by pagans, who made a noise of victory where Jews once raised shouts of praise to God (v. 7). This was happening because the Lord had abandoned His sanctuary and had handed over the city to the enemy of His people (v. 7). They were not taken from Him by force. This was a coming of the Lord in judgment against His people as a result of their sins and rebellions.

The disaster affected the elders and the young women or virgins of Jerusalem (v. 10). But it particularly impacted the prophet when he saw children, infants, and mothers struggling to survive (vv. 11–12). He was overcome with emotion over their condition, crying his heart out in pain over the apparently hopeless situation (v. 11). He felt unable to console the city (v. 13). The catastrophe was absolutely without parallel in his eyes. The prophets who should have delivered warnings from God to the people to bring them back from their evil ways (Jer. 23:22) had failed in their duties and instead communicated false and deceptive messages (Lam. 2:14; cf. Jer. 23:9–22).

2:15–17. The Sufferings of the City and the Taunts of Enemies. This situation could have been avoided. Had the nation repented, it might have enjoyed peace and prosperity again. But as it was, passersby would hiss and shake their heads, gloat and scoff at the nation's misfortune (vv. 15–16; cf. Obad. 12–15), and wonder why this calamity had struck Jerusalem (cf. Jer. 22:8). The reason was that Judah had forsaken the Lord (cf. Jer. 22:9). The catastrophe happened in accordance with God's ancient warnings (Lev. 26:14–16ff; Deut. 28:15ff). Therefore, what the people experienced was the fulfillment of prophecy (Lam. 2:17).

2:18–22. Appeal to God for Compassion. Jeremiah appealed to the wall of the daughter of Zion to lift her hands to God and take her sorrow to the Lord. The wall is personified to represent the whole city (vv. 18–19). In her desperation, the city responded and cried out in pain to the Lord, “How could this happen to us?” The people should have learned from the earlier experience of Israel (2 Kin. 6:25–29), but they did not (Jer. 3:6–10). Therefore, due to the severity of the siege, mothers in Judah stooped to eating their own offspring (Lam. 2:20; cf. Jer. 19:9), and God’s servants were killed within the holy precincts of the temple. There was no safe place for anyone in the day of the Lord’s anger (v. 22).

3:1–66

Hope Amid Crisis

Chapter three is the literal center of the book, with vv. 19–39 forming the theological hub, which gives meaning to the rest of the book and provides hope in an apparently hopeless situation. At times, the speaker appears to speak as an individual, but at other times he speaks on behalf of the population in general. The chapter moves from despair (vv. 1–20) to hope (vv. 21–29), mercy (vv. 40–47), and vindication (vv. 48–66).

3:1–20. A Cry of Despair. Jeremiah moves away from the specific description of the destruction of the city to a discussion of human suffering. Usually God’s leading (v. 2a) is toward salvation (Ex. 15:13) or out of captivity (Is. 40:11; 49:10; 63:13, 14), but here the Lord is a shepherd who seems to have misled, a ruler who oppresses and imprisons. The prophet says that the Lord led him to darkness (v. 2b), which represents imprisonment or even death (Ps. 88:10–12). He no longer listens to the prayers of those who suffer (Lam. 3:8) and has frustrated the intentions of the prophet (v. 9). The prophet depicts Him as a wild animal (vv. 10–11) and as a hunter performing target practice (vv. 12–13), someone who had served bitterness (lit. “poison”; v. 15). Jeremiah has been made an object of derisive laughter and ridicule (v. 14). As the prophet describes his condition, he concludes in a shout of despair that his strength/splendor and his hope are lost (v. 18). But sometimes hope can be found even in moments of extreme hopelessness.

3:21–39. A Ray of Hope. Hope flourishes when we recall the wonders of God’s mercies in our past experiences with Him. Jeremiah remembered the compassions of the Lord (vv. 20–22; cf. Ex. 34:6–7). Because His boundless mercies and inexhaustible compassion are new every morning (Lam. 3:22–23), the prophet could wait for or hope in (Heb. yakhal) the Lord (v. 24). Even in our trials, the Lord continues to be our “portion” (v. 24). This is a probable reference to the time when the Israelites received their allotments, except for the priests, for God said to Aaron that He Himself was the portion (or allotted share) for them (Num. 18:20). Even though they were now without a homeland, God would remain with them (Ps. 73:26).

Trials can be transformed into something positive for those who wait for or hope in (Heb. qawah) the Lord (Lam. 3:25; cf. Rom. 8:28). He can turn sufferings and trials into gains (cf. Ps. 94:12–14). It is therefore useful for us to learn to trust the Lord in times of difficulty and silence, for there may yet be hope (Lam. 3:29). The prophet was filled with confidence, knowing that it is not God’s nature (lit. “from His heart”) to cause grief (vv. 31–33). Even when our troubles are due to sin (v. 39; cf. Job 2:10), God shows compassion (v. 32). This leads to a call for repentance.

3:40–47. Appeal to God’s Mercy. In the midst of disaster, the prophet gave a call for the nation to examine itself and return to the Lord (vv. 40–41). It is only in Him that true refuge is found. In the absence of repentance, there was no divine forgiveness (v. 42). In the absence of forgiveness, the nation was faced with the disturbing anger of the Lord (vv. 43–47). He had forsaken them, and consequently He no longer listened to their concerns (v. 44). Enemies had overcome God’s people (vv. 46–47).

3:48–66. Assurance of Vindication. Perhaps the voice here describing streams of tears like water is that of the prophet (v. 48). Those who do not rebel against the Lord may also experience pain—their struggles may not always be the result of personal sin. In such cases, like Jeremiah’s, they bring their concerns to the Lord in prayer, seeking vindication (vv. 49–54). The prophet had been oppressed by his enemies, but he had not given up on the Lord. He could testify that God was close to him and had told him not to fear (v. 57). He confidently states that the Lord redeemed his life, thus vindicating him (v. 58). His enemies would receive what they deserved according to what they had done (v. 64), based on righteous judgment. He wanted the Lord to judge his case (v. 59) and to avenge his enemies for wronging him (vv. 60–66). It was not for him to avenge himself but for the Lord to do it with justice.

4:1–22*The Guilt of Zion's Leadership

Chapter 4, like chapter 2, is an eyewitness account of the contrast between Zion's former glory and present condition (vv. 1–10). The content of the two chapters is very similar although chapter 4 reiterates the Lord's part in the city's demise and emphasizes the effect of the ruin on the various classes of people rather than on the city itself. The blame is primarily laid at the feet of the religious leaders, who failed in their duties and thus became part of the problem (vv. 11–20). The chapter ends on a note of hope for the suffering people (vv. 21–22).

4:1–10. Then and Now—Contrast. The first two verses summarize the contents of the whole chapter. The fine gold referred to in v. 1 is clearly a metaphor for the precious children of Zion (v. 2), who are regarded as clay pots. The reference to the sacred stones of the sanctuary scattered all over the city points to the total destruction of the temple. The dwellers of the city had become worse than animals, neglecting their own infants (vv. 3–4). The rich were to be found among the ashes (v. 5), a symbol of humiliation and worthlessness (Gen. 18:27; Is. 44:20). The fate of the city was severer than that of Sodom due to the city's lingering condition, with no hand of compassion to help her (Lam. 4:6; cf. 1:7). The use of the term nezireah and its meaning here have puzzled scholars and elicited various translations: "Nazarites," "princes," "dignitaries," or "consecrated ones." It could refer to a select group who took a vow of self-discipline, such as abstaining from wine and contact with the dead—the "Nazarites" (Num. 6:2–8). It could also be a picture of an elite who was the epitome of leadership, health, and beauty, like Joseph, who was said to be a nazir of his brothers (Deut. 33:16). The situation had become so desperate that self-preservation had become everyone's sole focus, even if this meant cooking their own children (Lam. 4:10; cf. 2:20).

4:11–20. The Failure of Religious Leaders.

Verses 11–13 summarize what had happened and why. The fall of Jerusalem was unanticipated and came as a surprise to all (v. 12). Not only was the city strategically located between two converging valleys, but it was also the holy place of the Most High (Ps. 46:4). The Assyrian army had surrounded the city in 701 B.C. but was destroyed in the night by an angel (2 Kin. 19:35). The current collapse was due to internal weakness, the sins and iniquities of those who were appointed to ensure obedience to the covenant but who had become a part of the problem and the cause of the siege. This fact is emphasized in all the poems (Lam. 1:8; 2:14; 3:42; 4:13; 5:7). The priests, the prophets, and the elders had become unclean. When the people saw them, instead of showing respect, they shouted at them to go away because they were unclean (4:13–16). In vain, the people had worn out their eyes looking for help from Egypt (v. 17; cf. Jer. 37:5–10). The siege became increasingly oppressive (Lam. 4:18–19), and King Zedekiah—"the breath in [their] nostrils"—fled but was caught by the Babylonians (v. 20; cf. Jer. 39:4–7). The king is also identified as the anointed of the Lord, and the nation had felt safe under his shadow (Lam. 4:20; cf. Ps. 17:8). In spite of Zedekiah's resistance to the message, Jeremiah still considered him to be the appointed leader.

4:21–22. Enemies Warned against Gloating.

The book of Obadiah points out how the Edomites, descendants of Esau, took advantage of the chaos following the collapse of Jerusalem. Using irony, Jeremiah commanded them to rejoice while they could (v. 21), for the cup, a symbol of punishment and approaching death (cf. Is. 51:17; Jer. 25:15; Obad. 1:16; Mark 14:36), would ultimately be passed on to them. A note of hope is introduced, for the sin of Zion would ultimately be pardoned, and its punishment would end (cf. Is. 40:2).

5:1–22*Hope for the Future

This last chapter differs from the others. It is not an acrostic, but it has twenty-two lines, the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet. It is written in the form of a prayer, beginning with a review of the situation in Jerusalem (vv. 1–14) and climaxing in a plea to the Lord for help (vv. 15–22).

5:1–14. Orphans in Their Own Land. The poet calls on the Lord to remember His people (v. 1). Biblical "remembering" is not limited to the recollection of facts but includes acting upon that remembering (cf. Gen. 8:1; Ex. 2:24ff.). The emphasis is on the people's reversal of fortune. God's promised blessings—for example, land, houses, water (Deut. 6:10–11)—had been overturned (Lam. 5:2–4). The people were as defenseless as orphans and widows (v. 3). Their economy was controlled by foreigners (v. 4). Their status as God's special people had been removed, so there was no rest for them (v. 5), and their investment in alliances with Egypt and Assyria had proven futile (v. 6; cf. Hos. 2:5). The sins of the fathers were now being visited on their children (v. 7; cf. Jer. 3:25). Instead of being "the head and not the tail," as God had wanted them to be (Deut. 28:13), they were now being ruled over by servants or slaves (Lam. 5:8; cf. Prov. 30:21–22), and their young men (lit. "choice men") were grinding at the millstones, a work commonly done by women or slaves (cf. Judg. 16:21; Is. 47:2). Their religious and social life had been turned upside down (Lam. 5:12–14).

5:15–18. Admission of Guilt. Jeremiah was overwhelmed when he realized that the destruction of Jerusalem, which could have been avoided, was the result of the people's defiance of God's covenant. He exclaimed, "Woe to us, for we have sinned" (v. 16). He identified himself with his people and prayed on their behalf. He again fearlessly declared that the present deplorable condition of Jerusalem was a result of the sinful condition of the people. They were living in fear—their hearts were faint and they were slowly dying—their eyes were growing dim (dark; v. 17). The desolation of Zion was extremely depressing.

5:19–22. Plea for Restoration. The book opens with a cry of desperation but concludes with an assurance based on the central concept of the book—the Lord is good to those who wait and hope for Him (3:25). The experience of the fall of Jerusalem and the destruction of the temple would have raised questions about divine sovereignty and effectiveness. It is therefore appropriate for the book to end with an emphasis on the everlastingness of God. Everything may collapse, but God will remain King forever (v. 19). He is the final and supreme refuge. His throne is unshakable, and His kingdom will not be replaced by any other kingdom (cf. Dan 7:27). It is to this God that Jeremiah turned as the source of hope and restoration. Though it appeared that God had forgotten His people, the prophet nevertheless requested that He reestablish them (Lam. 5:21). This is about the divine willingness and initiative in restoring repentant sinners. The miracle of grace consists in the fact that it does for us what we cannot do for ourselves. The book closes in anticipation of the full renewal of God's people. Though it ends in the context of a desolating experience that appears to be the result of God's absence, hope remains that God's anger will be set aside and His people renewed (vv. 21–22). For those who accept God's offer of salvation through Christ, God's wrath has been removed: "God did not appoint us to wrath, but to obtain salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Thess. 5:9). The full realization of this salvation continues to be the hope of His people.

EZEKIEL

Title and Authorship. The title, “Ezekiel,” appropriately designates the person and prophetic voice of the book. Ezekiel (Heb. yekhezqe’l, “may God strengthen”) was a priest and prophet taken from Judah into exile by the Babylonians in 597 B.C. Mentioned twice in the book (1:3; 24:24), his name indicates encouragement and consolation. The book’s emphasis on purity and holiness points to Ezekiel’s priestly, Zadokite lineage (1:3; 40:46; 43:19; 44:15; 48:11). He writes of the Jerusalem temple with a depth of familiarity, which indicates his access to it by vocation. As a deeply devoted married man (24:15–16), he conveys the messages of Israel’s husband, Yahweh, with tenderness while also bearing the message that lambasted the people’s fornicating ways with a holy zeal.

The book of Ezekiel is part of the section of the OT known as the Major Prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel) and points to a time period covering more than two decades (ca. 592–571 B.C.). Several factors, which occur throughout the book, point to single authorship: (1) its consistency of thought, literary genres, ritual perspective and language, and uniform formulaic markers; (2) a clearly identifiable movement from judgment to restoration; (3) autobiographical accounts; and (4) a standardized usage of dates. Ezekiel’s messages mostly address “Israel” (e.g., 2:3; 3:1–9; 4:3; 8:9–12), though at the time of his call, the Northern Kingdom of Israel had already been taken into Exile. In this book, the preferential usage of the term “Israel” instead of “Judah” probably reflects the prevalence of the term since the time of Hezekiah’s reign. Hezekiah saw himself as the king of both Israel and Judah. The remnant of the Northern Kingdom had fled south to Judah after the Assyrians destroyed it. The usage of the term “Israel” also points to the promised reunification for Israel and Judah under the Davidic Shepherd (e.g., 37:18–28).

Date. Ezekiel prophesied during the reign of kings Jeconiah (Jehoiachin, 598–597 B.C.; 1 Chr. 3:16; Esth. 2:6; Jer. 24:1; 27:20; 28:4; 29:2) and Mattaniah (Zedekiah, 597–586 B.C.; 2 Kin. 24:17–20) from the Southern Kingdom of Judah (Ezek. 1:2–3). Jehoiachin, a young man of eighteen years, was brought to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar after reigning for only three months (2 Kin. 24:8–17; 2 Chr. 36:9–10). His uncle, Mattaniah, was installed as a puppet ruler until Israel’s final deportation in 586 B.C. The dating outline of the book uses Jehoiachin’s and Ezekiel’s exile (Ezek. 40:1) as its reference point. Ezekiel’s ministry is last dated in the twenty-seventh year after his deportation (29:17; ca. 570 B.C.). In addition, this dating plan serves a larger theological purpose: prophecies in the book serve to verify Ezekiel’s prophetic calling (cf. 2:5; Deut. 18:22) as well as significant events in Israel’s history. The book itself covers the period before and after the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C.

Backgrounds. God secured a place for His people at the crossroads of the nations. The temple was built for all nations to come to hear about Him and to worship Him as the true God. He had promised that after cutting off David’s enemies, God would first establish a royal dynasty under Himself as Israel’s true King and under the human king as His son; after that there would be an eternal Davidic kingdom under the Messiah, God’s Son in a unique sense (2 Sam. 7; cf. Ps. 89; Matt. 21:9; Luke 1:27; Rom. 1:3). After the Northern Kingdom of Israel apostatized and was taken into exile to Assyria, Judah was the sole witness to God’s glory and promises (722 B.C.; 2 Kin. 17). God graciously gave more than a century for Judah to fulfill His divine mission. However, by the time of the first Babylonian invasion (Dan. 1:1), Judah had also lost its way.

From the time of King Manasseh of Judah (ca. 697–643 B.C.; 2 Kin. 21:1–18), Israel continued to stumble along, so God sent a succession of prophets (Zephaniah, Jeremiah, Nahum, and Habakkuk) with strong messages of hope to warn Judah of its impending judgment if it did not repent and submit to God’s plan. The messages of faithfulness to God, rejection of idolatry, and biblical social justice (i.e., feeding the poor, caring for widows and orphans, and dealing honestly in business matters) were God's means of showing grace and mercy by providing for and protecting the vulnerable. Sadly, the rich and powerful used God's blessings to enrich and comfort themselves (Is. 5:11-12; Amos 6:4-6). They engaged in unauthorized political alliances that compromised cultural and worship customs (Is. 30:1-5; 31:1-3; Amos 3:13-15) and engaged in dishonest business practices (Is. 5:8-10; Mic. 6:11-16). Finally, they rebelled against God's messages (Mic. 2:6; 3:11-12). Ezekiel began his ministry alongside other prophets serving the exiled community in Babylon (Daniel) as well as those who remained in Israel (Jeremiah). By the time Ezekiel was called to the prophetic ministry, Jeremiah had been laboring for God's people for over three decades (Jer. 1:1-3) and they were in the process of reaping their final harvest of rebellion. Ezekiel's message, like those of the prophets before him, focuses on the religious leaders and their failure to fulfill God's plan. Their roles encompassed the administration of a godly society as a witness to the nations: (1) the prophet would proclaim God's messages of justice and righteousness; (2) the priest would mediate God's plan for forgiveness, purity, and worship; and (3) the Davidic king would administer God's ethic of justice and righteousness in Israel and oversee diplomatic overtures to the nations. Israel's godly society collapsed when the leaders thwarted God's organizational structure through wickedness and rebellion (Ezek. 7:26-27; 12:1-14:23). Against the background of Israel's failure and Assyria's ensuing demise by the late seventh century (626 B.C.; Is. 14:15-27), Babylon emerged as the major power in the ancient Near East.

During Ezekiel's prophetic career of over twenty years, Babylon was his point of reference, both geographically and politically (Ezek. 1:1). His vision of the Jerusalem temple served as God's point of reference for judgment, but Babylon served as the place where Ezekiel carried out his prophetic calling. During Ezekiel's captivity, Babylon's control over the region of Syria-Palestine was secure. The tendency to depend on Egypt for military help against Babylon (Is. 30–31) finally proved unfruitful to Judah (2 Kin. 24:7).

There are probably two reasons why Ezekiel does not use the reign of Zedekiah (597–586 B.C.) as a date marker. First, Zedekiah was a puppet king placed on the throne by Nebuchadnezzar

(2 Kin. 24:17). Second, Ezekiel's exile was connected with Jehoiachin's, so he used his experience as a reference point for the book as he associated himself with his fellow exiles. Jehoiachin's surrender and exile included the elite in Judah: the royal court, chief persons, military elite, craftspeople, and artisans (2 Kin. 24:14–16). Babylon often used this policy of removal to weaken the political and economic backbone of a nation in order to ensure that it would lack the potential for an organized revolt. The fact that many of the exiles were of the powerful and elite class of Judah is crucial to understanding God's command to Ezekiel to not fear their faces and words (Ezek. 2:6–7).

Theology and Purpose. The main character in the book of Ezekiel is the Lord, and consequently the theology of the book is developed around His words and actions. We will explore some of the concepts associated with Him.

1. Yahweh, the Lord of Glory. God's name, His character and reputation, plays a significant role in the book. The phrase "I am the Lord" appears more than one hundred times in various contexts throughout the book. Israel, as well as other nations, needed to know the true God and understand His gracious and holy ways (20:9, 14, 22; 36:20-23). These statements underpin Yahweh's sovereignty and require that humans worship Him. His character would be vindicated in the face of rampant idolatry inside and outside of Israel. God's abhorrence of idol worship stems from proud humans who ascribe glory and honor to the work of their hands rather than evincing a reverential awe for the Creator and Lord of life (6:4-13; 8:10; 14:3-7; 18:6-15; 20:7-39; 22:3, 4; 44:10-12). The glory of Yahweh was to be the central focus of Ezekiel's ministry. His condemnation of sin, portrayal of history, and messages of hope were to be understood as the outworking of God's glory. In the opening visions of the book, we find that prior to the destruction of Jerusalem, the glory of the Lord departed to Babylon (10:18-19; 11:16). In the closing visions, however, we see the return of the glory of the Lord to the temple (43:2-5). As it were, the Lord voluntarily exiled Himself and followed His people to Babylon; there He would comfort them and cause them to return to their "own land" (37:21).

2. Yahweh, the Lord of History. Ezekiel's considerable interest in the history of God's unfolding plan is expressed in the careful dating of his prophecies and in his outline of Israel's history and future (1:1-2; 3:16; 8:1; 20:1; 24:1; 26:1; 29:1, 17; 30:20; 31:1; 32:1, 17; 33:21; 40:1). Ezekiel frames three major historical reviews in the context of a marriage covenant: chapter 16 utilizes the metaphor of a bride, chapter 20 traces the history of Israel from the Exodus to the Exile, and chapter 23 utilizes the metaphor of unfaithful sisters that parallels chapter 16. History in Ezekiel is more than a cause-and-effect sequence of events. It is the unfolding of the sovereignty of God revealed in two important ways. First, through a messianic hope announcing the coming of a Shepherd-King, God would establish a messianic-centered community. Second, in this account of history God reveals His sovereignty through His promise to return to dwell in His temple. Ezekiel portrays the presence of God in His temple as central to Israel's hope (Ex. 33:15). In the context of a disaster, the Lord was ready to create a new hope for them.

3. Yahweh, the Judge of the Wicked and Vindicator of the Righteous. God's holiness demands justice against iniquity. Hence, the Babylonian Exile was the consequence of Israel's idolatry. Israel, as God's elect, had a high and holy mission to represent God's character of grace through just and righteous lives. They would proclaim His name and reputation to the nations through their ethical values, sanctuary system, prophetic utterances, praise and worship, and covenant faithfulness. However, Israel failed on all fronts, and God characterized them as a "rebellious house" (Ezek. 2:5–8; 3:9, 26; 12:2, 9; 17:12; 24:3; 44:6), indicating a tenacious unwillingness to yield to His authority. They often took up the cultic practices of their pagan neighbors (2 Kin. 21:10–18; 2 Chr. 28:1–4; Jer. 10:1–16). Daring to speak in the name of God, false prophets gave false messages (Jer. 28:1–17) while attempting to quench the voice of the true prophets (Amos 2:12; 7:10–13; Mic. 2:6). The people did not speak about trust in God's power to deliver, but they put their trust in foreign nations (2 Chr. 28:16; Is. 30:1–5). Finally, not only did the kings enter into unauthorized covenants and alliances with foreign rulers (2 Kin. 16:5–20; Jer. 37:1–10), but most of them also engaged in pagan practices (1 Kin. 11:1–8; 16:29–34) and thus encouraged the people to apostatize.

4. Prophecy and Covenant. Israel's creation, Exodus, election, and covenant are narrated in the Pentateuch and provide the background for many of the prophets' criticisms of the people. The history of the monarchy, as described in Samuel and Kings, gives the background for the ultimate failure of the people to live out God's unfolding covenant of grace. Prophets like Isaiah and Jeremiah provide chronological developments of the demise of both Israel and Judah, giving details that are not addressed in Ezekiel's book. Finally, the prophet Daniel, Ezekiel's contemporary, who also was in Babylon, provides a message that addresses the universal, apocalyptic perspective whose fulfillment reaches even to our days. Ezekiel mainly addresses the more local and immediate issues of Israel's restoration to the land of Canaan and points to the Messiah's mission. The book of Ezekiel plays a special role in the Christian's understanding of the book of Revelation, as the latter uses much of Ezekiel's imagery, themes, and language. Close attention to these parallels shows the consistency of God's plan and illustrates how the local situation of Judah in the sixth century B.C. can illuminate our understanding of the cosmic conflict in Scripture's last book.

5. Personal Application. We are remiss if we read Ezekiel simply as a historical record of the sins of Israel and Judah and God's pleas and punishments. The problems of Ezekiel's time are the problems of our time. We have the hindsight to look back and see the consequences of idolatrous hearts, stubbornness, and vile practices. The hope of Ezekiel's time is the hope of our time as well. For Israel, the ministry of reconciliation meted out through the earthly sanctuary was central to their relationship with God. For the church, the ministry of reconciliation is meted out through the cross and Christ's high priestly ministry in the heavenly sanctuary. In the book of Ezekiel, the church can see and learn what the book of Revelation describes and affirms—the throne room, God's heavenly sanctuary, as the vehicle through which hope and joyous worship are found (Rev. 4–5). As we listen in on Ezekiel, it behooves us to sit with the prophet and hear God's Word, to sit with the exiles and hear God's rebuke, and to sit in a foreign land and hear about a better one where the God of righteousness and purity reigns.

Literary Features. Ezekiel has been noted for its depth of descriptive imagery and the evocative prophetic indictments couched in language familiar to Israel from the Torah. This language signals Israel's unfaithfulness to God's covenant with the resulting curses uttered through a variety of prophetic speech patterns. Its wide array of depicted visions, symbolic acts, parables, and prophecies are intermingled with historical date markers, personal incidents, and prophecies.

Structure. The general survey of the book outlines a three-part structure: chapters 1–24, before Jerusalem falls; chapters 25–32, an indictment of the nations; and chapters 33–48, after Jerusalem falls. A more detailed study has revealed an intricate chiasmic structure:

- A God comes to His defiled temple to investigate and then departs (1–11)
- B Oracles of judgment for Israel (12–23)
  - C Jerusalem besieged (24)
  - D Oracles against the nations (25–28:10)
  - E Judgment on the fallen cherub (28:11–19)
  - D' Oracles against the nations (28:20–32:32)
  - C' Jerusalem falls (33)
- B' Oracles of restoration for the restored people (34–39)
- A' God comes to His restored temple to dwell with His people (40–48)

The structural emphasis of this chiasm brings into focus two complementary themes: (1) Yahweh, the Lord of history; and (2) the cosmic conflict motif (i.e., judgment on the fallen cherub). First, the storyline of the book moves historically from disaster (chaps. 4–7), judgment against Israel (chaps. 8–11), and alienation (chaps. 12–24) to joy, restoration, and communion (chaps. 34–48). The prediction of Jerusalem's Exile and final destruction in 586 B.C. is an indication of God's sovereignty over history. The dating system of the book can be broken up into three periods: (1) dates that focus on the reasons leading up to judgment and Exile (1:1; 8:1; 20:1); (2) dates that focus on the immediate circumstances of the judgment and Exile in international terms (24:1; 26:1; 29:1, 17; 30:20; 31:1; 32:1, 17; 33:21); and (3) one date concerning the postexilic plan of God for His restored people, their worship, and their land. Second, the battle between Yahweh (God's covenant name) and the false gods of the nations, through whom the anointed cherub Lucifer is working, is pervasive not only in international militaristic terms but also, as chapters 8–11 detail, in Israel's worship life and daily living.

Within the book there are smaller groupings by themes: prophecies of judgment through sign-acts (chaps. 4–5); judgment oracles against Israel (chaps. 6–7); parables of reproof and judgment (chaps. 15–17); judgment oracles against outside nations (chaps. 25–28); prophecies of a restored temple (chaps. 40–43); prophecies of restored worship (chaps. 44–46); and prophecies of a restored land (chaps. 47–48).

Literary Forms. As a prophet and trained priest, Ezekiel expresses God's message through various literary genres, prophetic formulas, and ritual expressions characteristic of his professions. The patterns of some of Ezekiel's speeches indicate that they were public proclamations that at some point were embedded into a structured literary book. A comparison of Ezekiel with the prophetic writings and speeches of the historical books (Judges through 2 Kings) and with the legal and cultic language of the Pentateuch (Genesis–Deuteronomy) reveals a similarity of literary patterns intended to guide the reader in understanding the biblical message more clearly. These literary patterns include genres, prophetic formulas, and acted parables. Among the literary genres we find:

- Narrative
- Call Narrative (Ezek. 1–3)
- Divine Abandonment and Return (8–11; 40–48)
- Poetry
- Oracles (28; 29:1–5; 31:1–9)
- Laments (19; 26:15–18; 27; 30; 32:1–21)
- Riddles, parables, allegories; for example, the parable of the vine and allegories of an eagle and cedars, a lion, and a boiling pot (15; 17; 19; 23; 24; 27).

Among the prophetic formulas we find:

- Judgment Oracles—a prophecy of calamity; a speech on behalf of God to announce disaster to individuals, groups, or nations.
- Salvation/Restoration Oracles—a prophecy of salvation; a speech on behalf of God that reverses a judgment to individuals, groups, or nations.
- Recognition Formula—a formula used to express the purpose of God's action. The main elements (with minor variations) are: (1) “and you/they shall know,” (2) “that I am Yahweh,” and sometimes (3) “when I....” This formula expresses God's sovereignty, revelatory purposes, and vindication of His reputation whether Israel suffered or prospered. This paradigm was first used in Exodus (Ex. 6:7; 7:5, 17; 14:4, 18; 16:12; 29:46).

- Revelation Formula—a formula used to identify how God communicates with His messenger to reveal Himself to the people. Two basic forms are “the hand of the Lord was upon me” and “the word of the Lord came to me, saying.”

Among the prophet’s acted-out object lessons or prophetic signs are the following:

- Ezekiel acting out the siege and destruction of Jerusalem (Ezek. 4:1–5:17).
- Ezekiel acting out the Exile (12:1–20).
- Ezekiel being commanded not to mourn his wife as a sign of Israel’s response to exile (24:15–27).
- Ezekiel using sticks to symbolize the reunification of Israel (37:15–28).

COMMENTARY

1:1–3:27

VISIONS OF GOD AND EZEKIEL’S CALL

Chapters 1–3 form a unit, an introductory collection of three visionary experiences that expose readers to the grandeur and indescribable glory of God and His mission for His servant (1:1–3:11; 3:12–21, 22–27). Each instance includes the same elements and similar or exact language. The use of similar language holds this unit together: smaller plot vignettes can be recognized by the repeated phrase “son of man” (2:1, 3, 6, 8; 3:1, 3, 4, 10, 17, 25), the characterization of Israel as rebellious (2:5, 6, 7; 3:9, 26, 27), and stylistic features such as small literary chiasms (cf. 2:6; 3:1) and parallel clauses (2:5, 7; 3:11, 27) seen best in the original Hebrew.

God’s revelation, call, and commission to Ezekiel manifested His purpose for His people and the world. Judgment on Israel and the nations would be an antidote to the injustice and anguish in a world bent on living apart from God and His creation design. In that vein, Ezekiel saw God coming from the north, from where judgment typically came in the form of nations hostile to Israel (26:7; Is. 41:25; Jer. 4:6; see “God’s Judgment in the Prophets,” p. 981).

Ezekiel’s first visionary experience sets forth the context of the book and the issues its messages express—judgment intended to turn the hearts of the rebellious and hold the unrepentant accountable. God called Ezekiel to a restorative mission that would possibly bear little fruit and would inevitably stir up animosity and dissension among the rebellious. Ezekiel’s response to God’s glory and His intention to pierce the hardened and disobedient hearts of His people exudes both awe and despondency. In Ezekiel’s book there is a record of God having the first and the last word with this prophet, encouraging him as He put His words in the prophet’s mouth and moved him from place to place. Like God’s other prophets, Ezekiel was responsible for holding the people (especially the leaders) accountable for their sins, calling them to return to God in covenant faithfulness. It is crucial to understand Ezekiel’s passiveness in the visionary experiences. He was picked up, transported, shown what God wanted him to see, and given the interpretation of the symbols. The book is entirely God’s word to His people through Ezekiel (e.g., 2:3–5). It is noteworthy how often it is said that “the word of the Lord came” to Ezekiel (e.g., 1:3; 20:45; 30:1; 38:1). It was not his word, but the Lord’s.

1:1–3

Setting, Context, and Prophetic Experience

Several years before the Babylonians’ final breach of the walls of Jerusalem (2 Kin. 25:2–4) in Ezekiel’s thirtieth year (Ezek. 1:1), which was the fifth year of King Jehoiachin’s exile (v. 2; 592 B.C.), Ezekiel was in the strange land of Babylon by the River Kebar (alternatively spelled as Chebar), known for the large manors and date palm groves located along its course. This “thirtieth year” most likely refers to Ezekiel’s age, which indicates that he was born around the year in which the book of the law was discovered in the temple (622 B.C.; 2 Kin. 22:8–20). His upbringing was filled with experiences of reformation and focused attention on the Word of God. Ezekiel and the other exiles, however, were not to enjoy the accoutrements of prosperity and blessing found in the Torah (cf. Deut. 6:10–11). They were most likely reduced to forced labor for irrigation canals in Babylon. They lived in strange settlements, not as guests but as the displaced covenant people of God (Deut. 28:45–68). Yet, what seemed catastrophic for the people was ultimately a sign of hope because the land was dormant and in a process of restoration until it was ready to receive back a purified people (Ezek. 36:24–28; Lev. 26:34; 2 Chr. 36:21). Ezekiel, in harmony with earlier prophets, warned of this impending judgment (Is. 39:6–7; Mic. 3:9–12; 4:10).

The introduction sets forth the main characters and setting of the book. The prophet was among the exiled people (Ezek. 1:1), which indicates he probably belonged to the upper class: the elite, the educated, and those skilled in various professions who were typically taken into exile (2 Kin. 24:14–16). This was the second wave of exiles taken to Babylon. The prophet Daniel was among the first wave taken in 605 B.C., during the reign of Jehoiakim, the father of Jehoiachin, when Nebuchadnezzar attacked Jerusalem and took the royal class hostage to Babylon (2 Chr. 36:6; Dan. 1:1). In Israel, God's covenant was a corporate relationship as much as it was individual. Not all of Israel individually rebelled against God, but as a nation, they failed to live up to His plan and turned their backs on Him (see Ezek. 18). Ezekiel was with them in the second deportation, and he had experienced the grueling and dehumanizing march of the faithless. It took Ezekiel and the caravan with which he was traveling many months to traverse the nearly 900 miles (1,448 km) from Jerusalem to Babylon. An army could have traveled much faster, but Ezekiel's fellow exiles probably included hungry and tired children and elderly people. This protracted march invited reflection.

When he was old enough to take up his priestly responsibilities (Num. 4:3, 23, 30), his prospects seemed hopeless outside of the temple in Jerusalem. Five years after the decimation of the Davidic kingship of Jehoiachin and the non-start of his priestly ministrations, Ezekiel received his prophetic call. Though God gave a message of encouragement through the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. 29:4–7), the outlook of a true worship experience seemed a faint pipe dream (Ps. 137:1–6). In this hopeless situation, from what was basically the beginning of a seventy-year waiting period (Jer. 29:10), God's call of Ezekiel involved both hope and judgment. It was from the throne of the universe that he received his commission to serve as a mouthpiece to correct and encourage his people. His message for them embraced a universal hope, the glory of God breaking out of the confines of geographical limitations.

Ezekiel knew about the glory of God appearing after the ordination of the Aaronic priests, and he saw similar elements as they appeared in his commission. The Levitical ordination finished with a sign of divine acceptance and fitness for priestly mediation in the proper worship of God (Lev. 9:6, 22–24). So God gave Ezekiel several indications of his divine ordination for the ministry of summoning the people to return to the true and proper worship of God (Ezek. 2–3). Ezekiel's response, the only acceptable one, was to fall down in reverential awe. In the Bible a theophany (i.e., an appearance of God) usually contains portents of hope (Num. 20:6–9; 2 Chr. 7:1–3), judgment (Num. 14:10–12; 16:19–50), or both. Here the phrase “the heavens were opened” (Ezek. 1:1), as used elsewhere in Scripture, points both to the threat of judgment and the hope of re-creation according to God's grace (Gen. 7:11; cf. Is. 24:18). The word of the Lord to Ezekiel in prophetic vision was signified by God's hand upon him (Ezek. 1:3; cf. 3:14, 22; 8:1; 37:1; 40:1), which could terrify in judgment (Ex. 9:3; Deut. 2:15; Josh. 22:31) or sustain, direct, and encourage the fulfillment of God's salvific plan (1 Kin. 18:46; Acts 11:21). Ezekiel's recounting of this dual purpose draws from the enduring revelations of God and indicates that the same God of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, and Israel was with him in exile.

1:4–28

Glory of the Lord Approaches

This section of Ezekiel's visionary experience focuses on three interconnected entities: the four living beings (vv. 5–14); the wheels (vv. 15–21); and the dais, the throne above, and God Himself (vv. 22–27).

In reverential awe, Ezekiel moves cautiously to his description of God. First, he describes a pyrotechnic storm cloud (v. 4; cf. Ex. 19:16; Job 38:1; Pss. 77:18; 107:25; 148:8) that he saw coming from the north, out of which came four living creatures. The prophetic books frequently utilize animal imagery to depict certain aspects commonly understood in historical and cultural contexts (cf. Dan. 7:1–8; 8:1–8). Ezekiel's description of these creatures is similar to ancient Near Eastern images of protectors of a deity (e.g., griffins in Persia and Greece, the sphinx in Egypt, winged bulls in Mesopotamia). His description is of a dynamic, gleaming, portable, Spirit-driven team of throne protectors or bearers. The major distinction in the Hebrew Bible is that they are not attached to mythological stories, but they appear in judgment scenes and the construction of the sanctuary as real entities (Ex. 25:17–22; 1 Kin. 6:15–30). The language and imagery is highly symbolic. The moveable chariot-throne would serve two purposes for the exiled community and for those in Jerusalem. First, it would affirm God as being not another deity confined to a temple but the Sovereign Lord. Second, it would acknowledge that the glory of the Holy One would not reside in a temple filled with abominable practices and competing idols.

Ezekiel was so overwhelmed by the awesome sight that it was not until fourteen months later that he would write a clear explanation of the powerful beings he saw and their relation to the work of God (Ezek. 10:3, 20). In Ezekiel's account, these angelic beings or cherubim are linked with God as guardian figures (28:14, 16; cf. Gen. 3:24). The Apostle John picks up on much of Ezekiel's language and description: (1) the fourfold description of the faces of a human, a lion, an ox, and an eagle (Ezek. 1:10; Rev. 4:6–8); (2) the glory throne with a rainbow over it (Ezek. 1:28; Rev. 4:2–3); (3) the brilliant and splendid appearance of God in luminous colors (Rev. 4:3); and (4) the terrifying magnificence of God's glory (Ezek. 1:26–27; Rev. 4:5; cf. Ex. 19:16). The significance of these beings in Scripture and in the ancient world comes from their association with divine majesty (the human face or image, Gen. 1:26–28; Ps. 8), royalty and ferocity (the lion, Ps. 7:2; Prov. 28:1; 30:30; Amos 3:8), speed and power (the eagle, 2 Sam. 1:23; Is. 40:31; Jer. 4:13), and strength and fertility (the ox, Deut. 33:17).

Ezekiel's account of the glory of the Lord (Ezek. 1:28) and the imagery of God as the Divine Warrior, a familiar concept in Israel's history (Deut. 33:26; Job 38:1; Pss. 18:7–14; 68:4; 104:3–4; Is. 19:1), are in harmony with the work God had come to do. Unfortunately, this time it would be not only against the enemies of His people but against His people as well. Ezekiel depicts the sound of the movement of God's throne in militaristic language. He uses language from after the Flood—God set His rainbow (lit. “bow,” the same word used for the weapon—Gen. 9:13; cf. Ezek. 1:28) in the clouds as a sign of His promise. In Ezekiel's account, the God of judgment and the Lord of restoration are one and the same. Against the backdrop of a firmament, expanse, or vault (vv. 22–26; cf. Gen. 1:6–8; Ex. 24:9–10), Ezekiel can only speak in similes as he uses language from the Creation narrative. He saw something that looked like a throne and someone who looked like (Heb. demut; Gen. 1:26) a human being (Heb. 'adam; Gen. 1:26), in appearance like gleaming metal, or a bonfire.

Ezekiel's descriptions of visions of God (Ezek. 1:1; 8:3; 40:2) portray an indescribable multimedia extravaganza that serves several purposes. What begins as a storm ends with the appearance of the throne of God front and center. Hence, the throne of God, His sovereignty, is central to understanding the book. The movement of the book reveals the glory of the Lord as a terror in judgment but ends as a source of hope to the people of God. Here Ezekiel writes concerning God as the ruler of the world responsible for Israel's exile—reassuring realities to him. Despite current circumstances, God promised that their exile would be for a limited period (Jer. 25:11; 29:10), that He would judge Babylon, and that Israel would go free (Is. 14:4, 22; 44:24–45:13; Jer. 28:4). Additionally, the glory of God reveals the serious nature of Israel's covenant breach. In times past, God had come to His people through His prophets to address their sins and rebellions. Now He would come to His sanctuary to investigate and render judgment (Ezek. 8–11).

2:1–10

God Calls and Prepares Ezekiel

Transitioning from observation to dialogue, Ezekiel records the divinely empowering call for him to stand on his feet and listen. The infusion of God's Spirit points to the life-giving potency of God's presence (3:24; 37:14; cf. Gen. 1:2–3). The account here of Ezekiel's call follows the familiar pattern of God sending an emissary for a special mission (Ezek. 2:3). In other texts, God is the subject of the “sending” in contexts of judgment (Ex. 9:14; Jer. 25:9, 15–16, 27; 29:17), protection (Ex. 23:20), and restoration (Mal. 3:1–2). The central themes of hope and judgment come to light as Ezekiel's ministry would be dominated by the leading of the Spirit. This emphasis serves to highlight the distinction between Ezekiel and false prophets (Ezek. 13:8–16). He was commanded to utter what he had first experienced. His physical weakness paralleled the spiritual weakness of the people and required the same remedy: the necessity for God's Spirit to empower the people to stand faithfully in the light of His presence and hear in obedient submission (chap. 37).

In Ezekiel's call and commission, God conferred His authoritative stamp on his ministry, the content of the message appearing afterward (2:4; 3:27). The focus is on the divine word and its efficacy (2:1–2, 7–8). Forty-nine times Ezekiel uses the announcement “The word of the LORD came to me” to confirm the divine origin of his message and the basis of judgment that stemmed from a divine assessment of the people’s sins as well as those of their ancestors (v. 3). The overwhelming designation of the people of Israel in the book is that they were rebellious. The Hebrew Bible uses the noun “rebellion” (Heb. meri) twenty-four times; sixteen of those are used by Ezekiel to indicate a central problem in Israel. God’s description of Israel’s rebellious mind and actions appears in various ways. Their actions (v. 3; “they rebelled,” “they broke faith with”) and their disposition, literally described as “hard-faced” and “strong of heart” (i.e., obstinate or impudent and stubborn; v. 4), are structurally central and the reason for God sending Ezekiel. God said:

- A I am sending you to the children of Israel (v. 3a)
- B They are a rebellious house/people who rebelled against God (v. 3b)
- B' They are impudent/obstinate and stubborn children (v. 4a)
- A' I am sending you to them (v. 4b)

The irony is profound: the rebellious people were exiled because they had been rebellious, but instead of surrendering to God, they continued on their present course. Verses 5–7 sharpen the focus on the obstinate, hostile reaction and dangerously aggressive response to the divine message.

- A Ezekiel would convey God’s messages whether they listened or not (v. 5)
- B He was not to be afraid of them or their words (v. 6a)
- C Briers and thorns were around him and he lived among scorpions (v. 6b)
- B' He was not to be afraid because of their words or presence (v. 6c)
- A' He would give God’s messages regardless of whether they listened or not—the people were rebellious (v. 7)

The rebellious nature of the people “to this very day” (v. 3) is further developed in chapters 16 and 23. The validity of the message is grounded in the source of its authority; people would know that the Lord had sent a prophet. The fulfillment of the prophetic word implies that by delivering his message, Ezekiel demonstrated his commission, his reception of the divine instruction, and his mission as God’s authorized messenger. God’s command for Ezekiel to open his mouth and eat what God was giving him (v. 8) emphasized the source of the message as well as the problem with the people. Not only were they rebellious, but they also refused to take the medicine God offered for their healing: His word and its authority. And instead of consuming the humbling divine message of rebuke, the rebellious house in Jerusalem would eat their children (5:10; cf. Deut. 28:53–57).

3:1–11

God’s Preparatory Commissioning and Empowerment

God was preparing Ezekiel for his prophetic ministry in two ways: through Ezekiel’s consumption of the message (vv. 1–3) and through the divine strengthening for the negative response he would receive (vv. 4–11). The divine command to “Go!” (vv. 1, 4, 11) structures Ezekiel’s commission. This command focuses on his reception of the message in the form of a scroll. As can be seen throughout the book, symbolic actions follow a similar pattern of an introductory formula (2:8), a symbol or sign-act (3:1–3), and a prophetic interpretation (vv. 4–11). The scroll is described as a symbol of the message of lamentation, mourning, and woe (2:10). The symbolic action of eating the scroll is interpreted as a prophecy: as the eaten scroll contains lamentations, mourning, and woe, so too the substance of and the responses to Ezekiel’s prophecies and revelations consist of lamentations, mourning, and woe from God’s people. Thus, the command to eat portrays a divine enablement to absorb the prophetic word in its most hopeful, doleful, and woeful tones (Jer. 15:16). The assertion that God fed Ezekiel the scroll, or caused him to eat it, evokes the passive reception on Ezekiel’s part while emphasizing that his mission encompassed divine content and carried the force of God’s will. By eating the scroll, the prophet appropriated the divine message and joyfully accepted the prophetic call.

Ezekiel was not commissioned to go to a foreign nation that might show signs of receptivity (cf. Ezra 1:2–4; Jon. 3:6–10) but to those who had the benefit of the revelation and grace of God for over a millennium. The repeated references to the recipients as the bet yisra’el (“house” or “people of Israel”) emphasize the message as being for the covenant people (cf. Deut. 30:11–20) who had participated in a persistent, self-induced spiritual coma (Ezek. 3:1, 4, 5, 7, 11). Israel's response was foretold as an unwillingness to obey and submit to God's humbling tutelage under Nebuchadnezzar, for they were hardheaded and trusted in human devices (namely, Egyptian support) to solve their crises (cf. chap. 17; 2 Kin. 24:20; Jer. 27; Hab. 1:5–11). As a sensitive and caring soul (Ezek. 24:15–18), Ezekiel was prepared by God with the strongest resolve for a head-on collision (3:7–9; cf. Jer. 1:18). In the face of corporate rebellion, God empowered Ezekiel to neither fear the aged, the powerful, or the multitude, nor become emotionally dismayed or shattered (khatal, “dismayed,” “terrified”) by Israel's abominations, acceptance of false prophecies, or recalcitrant attitude toward the true prophetic message (cf. Ezek. 2:6).

3:12–21

The Spirit's Work and Warning

Up to this point, Ezekiel has described the movement of the living creatures and his own experience in harmony with the Spirit (1:17–21; 2:2). Consequently, he describes the two together as the account of his first visionary experience closes (3:12–15). Two powerful and overwhelming experiences converged as the Spirit lifted him up while he heard the departure of the living creatures lifting up the glory of Yahweh with the sound of a great earthquake (cf. 1:24; 3:13). The creatures' wings flapped together, creating a divine panoramic perspective as he was brought back to the Chebar River (1:1; 3:15) at the village tel 'abib (“mound of the flood,” i.e., “mound of ruins”). Back to reality, bitter with an intense anger or “heat” of spirit, he sat appalled among his fellow exiles for seven days. His reality forced him to wrestle with the certainty that many, if not most, of those he dwelled among were just described to him as the callous rebels who would fight against God's message of rebuke. So the word of the Lord came to him again to explain his role as a watchman for the house of Israel (vv. 16–17; cf. Is. 21:6–8; Jer. 6:17–21).

Ezekiel's mission and message of rebuke and judgment were so vital to the restoration of Israel that God repeated it right before the message of the fall of the city reached them (Ezek. 33:1–9). The relation between God and the prophet is clearly stated: he would give God's warning to the people (3:17). He was the messenger of the Lord in charge of delivering a clear message; the prophet must deliver a dire warning of death, or he would be held accountable for the death of the wicked

(vv. 18–19). The future of the people would be determined by their response to God's message of warning that was conveyed to them through the divine word. God described the status of His people before Him in moral terms: the “wicked” (vv. 18–19) and the “righteous” (vv. 20–21). The morally upright were the true covenant keepers (Deut. 6–9), and the morally bankrupt were the covenant breakers (Ezek. 16:8, 59–63; 17:13–19). The assent to outward religious ceremonies (cf. Is. 1:5–15), as outlined in the Pentateuch, was no evidence of true faithfulness. The main covenant breaches of the people were: (1) idolatry (Ezek. 6:13; 8:10; 14:3–7; 20:8–39; Deut. 12:29–32); (2) false leadership, including false prophecy (Ezek. 11:1–13; 14:1–11; 34; Deut. 13); (3) social injustice (Ezek. 16:49; 18:5–18; 22:29; Lev. 25:36, 37; Deut. 23:19, 20), and (4) religious syncretism (Ezek. 16:36; Deut. 17:17; 18:9–14). The divine declaration identifying the wicked and the righteous was made in the courtroom of God's heavenly sanctuary. We should keep in mind that its earthly counterpart was in a state of disrepute and impurity (Ezek. 8).

Ezekiel's own deliverance would be connected to the faithfulness he exercised toward his calling, but his culpability for neglecting his role would receive God's judgment (3:19, 21). As watchman, his vocation required wisdom and discernment to recognize danger and report it for the safety of God's people (2 Sam. 18:24; 2 Kin. 9:17). The danger ironically came from within their hearts. His proclamation of God's message was not to inspire the people to greatness but to call them to humility and surrender; they were to turn from wickedness and dwell in God's righteousness (Ezek. 3:19–20). Yesterday's good deeds provide no assurance for today's standing before God, and today's failures can be repented of as long as the doors of God's mercy are still open.

3:22–27

God's Sovereignty over Ezekiel's Ministry

In the final part of his prophetic calling, Ezekiel was taken in a visionary experience that ended where it began. Following what he saw (the glory of the Lord, 1:28), how he reacted (falling on his face, 1:28), and the work of the Spirit in him (infusing, standing, speaking; 2:2), Ezekiel was commanded to shut himself inside his house (3:24). It seems like an ironic order in light of God's earlier instruction to speak to His people (2:7; 3:4). However, Ezekiel was to be bound (v. 25) by God's sovereignty regarding how he should interact with the people. The glory of Yahweh was to be the central focus of Ezekiel's ministry. His condemnation of sin, his portrayal of history, and the messages of hope are to be understood as the outworking of God's glory. The muteness that was imposed should not be understood as Ezekiel's inability to talk. Indeed, he would speak after receiving his call (4:14; 5:5–17; 11:25). Because they were a rebellious people, the temptation for Ezekiel would be to rebuke or reprove/arbitrate (3:26) on behalf of the people. God would have none of it; a true assessment of their spiritual condition and its practical implications was necessary to prepare the people for true repentance. God would open his mouth to engage in a type of reconciliatory mission after Jerusalem's fall (33:22). Until then, only messages of God's judgment would come from Ezekiel's mouth.

4:1—7:27

JERUSALEM'S JUDGMENT

Chapters 4–7 form a unit that elaborates on Jerusalem's judgment and the devastation that would follow. This unit can be divided into two sections, namely, (1) sign-acts or acted-out object lessons (chap. 4, the siege of Jerusalem; chap. 5, Jerusalem's judgment and exile) and (2) judgment oracles (chap. 6, the mountains of Israel; chap. 7, the disaster soon to come). Chapters 5 and 6 begin with "son of man, take," while chapters 6 and 7 begin with God's word coming to Ezekiel, who is addressed as "son of man," and end with the same phrase affirming that they will know that God is Yahweh through His described judgments and actions. (On the concept of judgment, see "God's Judgment in the Prophets," p. 981.)

4:1—5:17

God's Sign-Acts

Chapter 4 records the beginning of God's prophetic show-and-tell (cf. Is. 20:2–3; Jer. 13:1–7; 19:1–5; 27:1–22; Hos. 1:1–9), followed by symbolic actions and a prophetic interpretation. Chapters 4 and 5 record symbolic actions: (1) building a model siege (Ezek. 4:1–3), (2) lying on his sides (vv. 4–8), (3) preparing a siege diet (vv. 9–17), and (4) dividing up hair (5:1–17). They follow a similar pattern: God addressing Ezekiel as "son of man" and then commanding him to engage in a sign-act.

4:1–3. Ezekiel's Street Ministry. Ezekiel was commanded to take a piece of clay and draw on it a picture of Jerusalem under siege, including the details of a siege with ramps, camps, and battering rams (cf. 2 Kin. 25:1; Jer. 39:1–7). The intricate detail indicates that the city was entrapped so that no one could get out and the besiegers would be able to intercept incoming supplies. The process would be laborious and psychologically overwhelming, yet efficient. God previously told the people that He would cut off all staples necessary for survival (Is. 3:1) and thus create a situation that implemented a covenant curse: the lack of bread (Lev. 26:26). Here in Ezekiel, it is God who proclaims through these acts that an army would besiege Jerusalem and break through the wall to take the city captive.

4:4–8. Prophetic Time and Judgment. Ezekiel has established the action to take place; now he describes the duration. He would lie on each of his sides in turn. God Himself makes clear His, not Babylon's, control of Israel's future. The time appears here as converted from years to days. The three hundred and ninety days for Israel and forty days for Judah (v. 5) are representative of the period of each kingdom's defection. The times generally refer to the starting period of the divided monarchy for Israel and the beginning of the downfall for Judah. Similarly, Numbers 14:34–35 reverses a day for a year and states that Israel would bear their punishment for forty years, a year for each day that the spies searched the land. Both texts associate one or more time periods with judgment for Israel's rebellion. Ezekiel's historical view of Israel in chapters 16 and 23 indicates that Israel's monarchical failure was one in a long line of apostasies. God commanded the prophet to roll up his sleeves for his prophetic work that, before the fall of Jerusalem, would be centered on judgment against Israel.

4:9–17. Unclean Food and People. Ezekiel's next symbolic actions involved bread, water, and dung. He was to bake bread using dung as fuel, to eat measured portions of it, and to drink measured portions of water, indicating the smallest of rations for the people of Israel during the siege. This command is connected to the previous one because God ordered Ezekiel to eat the rations during his symbolic action of lying on his side (v. 9). God described the experience of the Exile using the language of covenant curses. Ezekiel's rationed meal times (v. 10) and small portions indicated that Israel would have to eat bread and drink water in rations because God would make food and drink scarce, breaking their supply of food (v. 16; 5:16; Lev. 26:26). Also, among the Gentile nations where God would drive them, Israel would eat food defiled by the use of human waste as fuel (Ezek. 4:10–11, 13; Josh. 22:19). Human waste was unclean and had to remain outside the camp of Israel (Deut. 23:15). Ezekiel's revulsion to engage in such culinary procedures harked back to his priestly training and faithfulness to ritual cleanliness and avoidance of forbidden food (Ezek. 4:14; cf. Lev. 5:2; 7:18, 24; 17:15; 22:8). Ironically, it highlights the condition of Israel, defiled and under a covenant curse. God allowed Ezekiel to substitute human waste with cow dung and then reiterated the prophecy of Jerusalem's coming starvation (Ezek. 4:15–17).

5:1–4. God's Barbershop and Israel's Trouble.

In an increasingly doleful picture of a slowly emaciating, malnourished form, Ezekiel was commanded to shave his hair and his beard, divide it into three parts, and then burn one-third, repeatedly strike one-third, and scatter one-third. After the description of the trauma of a siege, the protracted act of shaving with a sword or sharp knife indicated that one-third of Jerusalem would be a smoldering heap, destroyed by fire. One-third would suffer a military defeat that would leave an unsightly bloodbath. Finally, one-third would be scattered, exiled from the land of Judah with God pursuing them as an enemy. A small number of them or a remnant (v. 3), made up of the poor, would be left over in the land (Jer. 52:16). In addition to the escalation of catastrophes, an unavoidable experience of horror would come to the people of Jerusalem.

If one thing did not get them, something else would (cf. Amos 5:19).

5:5–17. God's Dynamic Speech. In a series of four prophetic announcements that emphasize His sovereign lordship, the messenger formula ("Thus says the 'adonai yahweh'"—"Thus says the Lord God," or "This is what the Sovereign Lord says") is used three times in vv. 5, 7, 8 (cf. v. 11). God explained why judgment was coming. First, God set Judah at the crossroads of the major nations (Mesopotamia, Egypt, and Syria) to be a light, but the people rebelled by refusing God's lordship (vv. 5–6). In their refusal to accept the divine charter for a just and holy society, the people did not even follow the customs of the pagan nations (v. 7). Second, Israel tended toward a syncretistic practice of religion (2 Kin. 16–17). Thus, the worst scenario of God's response would be their punishment: God changing His role from that of covenant Lord to that of enemy (Ezek. 5:8). Israel saw God break greater nations like Egypt, Syria, and Assyria. Now, without the empowering and life-transforming presence of God as an ally, the basest human instincts would emerge in the form of a famine-induced cannibalistic fury (v. 10). Verse 11 gives the first indication of what is described in chapters 8–11, namely, the withdrawal of God from His sanctuary. Third, Israel had been unfaithful to God. In vv. 12–15, Ezekiel's sign-acts are interpreted as covenant curses: plague, famine, sword, and exile (Lev. 26:25–39; Jer. 29:17). Fourth, its results would be revelatory and missional; the judgment would remind the people and the nations that God is the sovereign Lord (Ezek. 5:16–17). (On the concept of judgment, see below, "God's Judgment in the Prophets.")

God's Judgment in the Prophets

The messages of the prophets are in most cases announcements of judgment or salvation. In the case of prophecies of judgment, we encounter expressions and language that may sound too strong to the contemporary reader. For example, in regard to His punishments, God spoke of (1) parents eating their children (Ezek. 5:8–10); (2) cutting off food and causing famine (14:13); (3) the destruction of infants and the rape of women (Is. 13:16); and (4) destruction by cruel people in which the Israelites would become "fuel for the fire" (Ezek. 21:31–32). There are many other passages like these. We suggest that when reading the prophetic announcements of judgment, we should keep in mind a few principles or concepts that may help us understand the origin and reason for such seemingly harsh language.

1. Covenant and Judgment. When we read the messages of judgment proclaimed by the prophets against Israel, we find in practically all of them the common charge that the people had violated the covenant relationship with the Lord. The covenant between God and Israel was established after God redeemed His people from Egypt and permanently formalized the initial redemptive relationship He had established with them. God became their God, and they were constituted into His people. Within that covenant relationship, the people enjoyed God's presence and blessings. The violation of the covenant by the people was a rejection of the covenant and of the Lord of the covenant (i.e., a claim of independence from Him). In most cases this act of rebellion expressed itself in the worship of other gods and in political alliances with other nations that were intended to secure self-preservation in case of war (e.g., Hos. 7:11; 12:1). Theologically speaking, the people were in fact abandoning the sphere where divine blessings were operative and entering into the dangerous realm of sin and death (i.e., the curses of the covenant). After the violation of the covenant, the people of Israel had two alternatives: either to repent and renew their commitment to the covenant (which would mean forgiveness and healing from the Lord) or to continue the path of rebellion and separation from God (which would mean abandonment by the Lord and destruction). The prophetic word that connected covenant and judgment was used to provide a legal foundation for the announced judgment of God. Judgment was not an irrational or arbitrary decision on the part of a violent God but what the people should have legally expected from Him in response to their rebellious actions against the loving covenant Lord.

2. Prophetic Nature of the Judgment. The words of judgment proclaimed by the prophets were indeed prophecies concerning what the Lord would do soon or even in the distant future. The fact that the judgments were proclaimed before they happened served several purposes. Among these we mention a few: First, in some cases the description of the nature of the coming judgment was so intense that it could have and should have moved the people to repentance in order to avoid its damaging effects—it should have appealed not only to their emotions but also to their reason. Second, the prophetic prediction demonstrated that the Lord knew what was going to happen and that consequently He was not surprised by the unfolding events. The implication is that the divine judgments revealed God's sovereignty over history. He, not the nations, was in ultimate control of what would happen to Israel. Third, by announcing the coming defeat of His people, the Lord was demonstrating that the nations that would attack Israel were not more powerful than He. In fact, it was the Lord who was using the nations to accomplish His own purpose, namely, disciplining His people for their sins. But in doing this, there was great pain in the heart of the covenant Lord (cf. Hos. 11:8).

3. Rejection of the Lord and Judgment. Breaking with the Lord, who was and continued to be the only reliable "place" of safety, left the people of Israel at the mercy of their enemies. The result of their rejection of the Lord blocked the only source of blessings and life, bringing with it famine and plagues. These results were not the impersonal and automatic consequences of sin but those of God's decision to abandon the city, the temple, and the land. They chose to abandon Him, and He honored their decision by abandoning them—He granted them their wish. Most of the language used in the messages of judgment against the people is of a military or political nature. What we often read about is what a military attack would look like: the siege of the city bringing famine, and often cannibalism, inside the city (Ezek. 5:8-10); the destruction of the city and the temple (Jer. 9:11; 12:10-12); the raping of women (Lam. 5:11); the killing of children, women, and men (Is. 13:16); and the leaving behind of a few survivors, many of whom would have preferred to die during the attack. The language describes the cruelty and inhumanity of war, not of God. In a sense the Lord assumes responsibility for the military fall of His people by referring to it as His response to their rebellion. Ultimately, the people are responsible for what happened to them because of their rejection of the covenant Lord (Jer. 18:16). In the destruction of Samaria or Jerusalem, the nations did not defeat the Lord nor did they defeat His people; it was the Lord who handed His people over to the nations because Israel had chosen the path leading to death rather than the one leading to life with Him (Deut. 30:15-19; Jer. 12:7; 21:8).

4. Judgment and Cosmic Conflict. God's people have always existed in the context of a cosmic conflict. This conflict does not take place in a mythical world but in the arena of human history. The enemies of Israel were primarily the political and military powers of the nations that surrounded them, but behind the nations were their gods and the demonic powers that in many cases influenced the people of God (see Ezek. 28:14). This often led Israel into idolatry, a rebellion against the Lord that left them vulnerable to military defeat and political oppression as the Lord handed them over to their enemies. In the context of the cosmic conflict and through the words of judgment, the Lord continued to inform His people that there was hope for them because not only was He in control of what was happening to them, but He would also be fighting for them against their enemies if His people returned to Him. Through His judgments, He would ultimately defeat the nations and their gods (Jer. 51–52). God's last word was not condemnation but salvation and victory for the remnant of His people and of the nations who would come and worship Him in His temple (Is. 2:3). Because of the righteousness of God's judgment, His people would recognize that He was righteous in what He did to them (Ezek. 14:21–23), and the nations would come to know that "I am the LORD" (36:23). The end result of the judgments would be that the nations would no longer take up the sword against each other nor train for war ever again (Is. 2:4).

6:1–7:27

The Nations Will Know That I Am Yahweh

Through a series of prophetic formulas (recognition formula—"you will know that I am yahweh": 6:7, 10, 13, 14; 7:4, 9, 27; messenger formula: 6:3, 11; 7:2, 5), Ezekiel proclaims God's authoritative speeches of judgment coming on the people. These prophetic formulas also serve to organize the messages. The structure of chapter 6 expresses an alternating parallel format and thus emphasizes knowing the identity of Yahweh in the face of idolatry (vv. 4–6, 13). The chapter is introduced by a messenger formula plus a "son of man" command in vv. 1–2.

- A First announcement of punishment: Destruction of idolatrous worship and people (vv. 3–7)
Summary: Recognition formula
- B Description of the results of rebellion: Only a remorseful remnant left (vv. 8–10)
Summary: Recognition formula
- A' Second announcement of punishment: Famine, sword, and plague (vv. 11–13a)
Summary: Recognition formula
- B' Description of the results of rebellion: The land desolate (vv. 13b–14)
Summary: Recognition formula

Picking up much of the language used in Isaiah 13:1–16, Ezekiel 7 can be divided into three sections that announce the coming judgment (vv. 2–4, 5–9, and 10–27). All three sections assert that the end is coming by using different emphases—the certitude, the experience, and the results (the end, v. 2; disaster, v. 5; doom, v. 10).

6:1–10. Judgment: Defilement and Restoration. God continued to ask Ezekiel to proclaim His message against the rebellion of His people. Anticipating His departure from the sanctuary and city, God painted a doleful picture of death, decay, and destruction while using the language of the covenant curses (Lev. 26:25–32). God would decimate the holy vessels along with the carved idols beside them (Ezek. 6:4–5). The mixture of the holy and the profane necessitated a complete eradication of the works of humans (cf. Gen. 7:23). Chapters 8 and 9 more fully depict the extent of idolatry among God's people and its requisite result of judgment, defilement, and execution. Both here and in chapter 9, the remnant are described as penitent (Ezek. 6:9; 9:4). The description of the destruction of the altars uses what is typically called a divine passive (the use of the passive voice of the verb to denote the hidden action of God as the agent responsible for the activity) and is used mainly in reference to the articles of worship (6:4, 6). Concerning the people, Ezekiel presents God's message with Him speaking in the first person (vv. 4–5, 8). The very presence of corpses would have the effect of defiling everything within the same enclosed space

(Num. 19:14–15). The place chosen by God to be a center of worship (Deut. 12:1–7) had become an abominable place.

So Israel's rebellion was twofold: they set up competing worship sites (cf. 1 Kin. 11:1–8), and they set up idols instead of tearing them down. Ezekiel 6:8–10 shifts the focus from the announcement of judgment to its devastation: a few survivors (Ezek. 7:16), a scattered captive nation (5:10, 12), and a self-loathing disgust and revulsion of their covenant infidelity (cf. Ps. 119:158). On the other hand, the results of judgment would elicit a faithful remnant who would remember their Lord and recognize His claims on them (Ezek. 6:8–10; cf. 20:43; 36:31). He in turn will remember His promise and restore the relationship the people had broken (Lev. 26:40–45).

6:11–14. Judgment: Death and Destruction.

Verses 3–10 and 11–14 share many of the same words and parallel phrases, but the emphases are radically different. The sections that describe the results of rebellion (vv. 8–10, 13b–14) both serve as a prophetic affirmation of God being in control: He knows the future and He is directing events to those ends. The first section (vv. 8–10) ends with the hope of restoration among the exiles and with Ezekiel's word of hope to those scattered among the nations and lands. This second section (vv. 11–14) ends with an account of the despair of the wicked and with Ezekiel's word of judgment against those far/outside the city proper, those near/inside the city, and those left over (v. 12; cf. v. 14; 7:15–16). Through both restoration and judgment, all would know that God is the Lord of the covenant, the Lord of history, and the Lord of human destiny.

Ezekiel was commanded to express feelings of anger and lamentation—to stamp his feet in conjunction with clapping his hands and to say, “Alas” (v. 11). These actions would depict God's anger in response to the wickedness of the people. The destruction that would follow (sword, famine, and plague/pestilence) was known to the people as evidence of divine displeasure in the form of covenant curses. Ezekiel condemns the mountains of Israel (v. 13), which earlier referred to people (v. 2), because the people built high places or cultic platforms on them. These were often situated on the wooded heights of hills or mountains frequently used for idolatrous worship (e.g., Lev. 26:30; Num. 33:52; Deut. 12:2; 1 Kin. 14:23). The people used sweet incense (Ezek. 6:13) to cover the stench of their idolatry. God would turn their cultic groves into a desolate wasteland all throughout the furthest reaches of Israel's territorial extent (47:17–20; Num. 34:11).

7:1–4. The End Is Coming. With a tripart blast of urgent warning (vv. 2–3, 6), God sought from His people a response of faith and a recognition of the impending danger. The two keywords in this chapter—the Hebrew verb bo' (contextually here, “to come,” “to enter,” or “to bring”; vv. 2, 5–7, 10, 12, 22, 24–26) and the noun qets (“end”; vv. 2–3, 6)—emphasize the imminence, certainty, and pervasiveness of judgment. God addressed the message to the land of Israel (vv. 2, 7), but contextually it was directed to the exiled community. The purpose for both communities was the same: God would punish them for their evil ways (vv. 3–4). Zedekiah's rebellion and the messages from false prophets like Hananiah (Jer. 28:1–17) and Shemaiah (Jer. 29:24–32) may have encouraged some to think that geopolitics was the answer to their circumstances. Evidently, their influence was so strong that Jeremiah had to send a letter to the exiled community in Babylon (Jer. 29:1–23).

The punishment would match the crime (Ezek. 7:3), and the picture of the coming judgment evoked the deepest feelings of abandonment (cf. 6:9). Though not the eschatological end, Ezekiel uses eschatological language (“the four corners of the land”; 7:2b) to indicate not simply a transition to another king but a cataclysmic end of the kingdom. The covenant promises that God made to David would reach fruition, not through the stratagems of a political kingship (chap. 34; cf. Pss. 89, 110) but through God's kingship (Matt. 4:17; Mark 1:14). The scope, experience, and results of judgment are associated with God's anger (Ezek. 7:3, 8), disaster (v. 5), doom (v. 7), tumult (v. 7), horror/terror (v. 18), day of wrath (v. 19), and devastation/desolation (v. 27). They would know that God is the covenant Lord because of His complete defeat of the wicked.

7:5–9. The Fury of the Lord. This section almost seems redundant in its language, yet it has, among other things, two pivotal functions: emphasis and anticipation. The certainty of the end is repeated, but now the experience of disaster and the psychological paralysis of impending doom is added (vv. 5–7). The finality of God's actions in pouring out His anger without pity would overwhelm the people (vv. 8–9; cf. Zeph. 1:14–16). Israel's wickedness had ripened, and it had borne the fruit of idolatry, social injustice, and abominable practices; the Master Harvester must come, and the people would reap the judgment that they had sown in their pride (cf. Rev. 14:14–20).

7:10–27. The Totality of Judgment. Arboreal imagery is used to describe the wickedness of Israel. Violence is pictured as growing into a lematteh resha' (translated as either “a rod of wickedness” or “a rod to punish the wicked”; v. 11). Aaron’s staff budded under the blessing of God (Num. 17), but here Ezekiel reverses the picture with a botanical metaphor showing the result of the wickedness of the people—God’s curse was coming in the form of the Babylonian invasion. This invasion would have multiple effects. In the ancient Near East there was not a clear separation of civic, religious, and economic life. Together they expressed an integrated whole of life and the consequent impact on the life of the people. Babylon’s invasion was seen as (1) creating economic turmoil (Ezek. 7:12–19), (2) a profanation of the land (vv. 20–24), and (3) a devastation of political life (vv. 25–27).

As a result of God’s judgment, the commercial life in Israel would come to an end (vv. 12–13a). This meant that the buyer and the seller alike would share the same fate. Their most treasured possessions—land, temple, and holy furnishings—would become the booty of the invaders (v. 21). Ezekiel uses linguistic parallels to draw out the association of God’s judgment with the irrevocable outcome of the word of God given in the vision (vv. 12–13; chaps. 4–6).

Typically, a trumpet was blown in times of warfare as a call to prepare for battle (7:14; Num. 10:9). But Israel had prepared for battle in vain; they would only suffer the casualties of divine warfare against them (Ezek. 7:14–15). Even the physiological effects (v. 17) reflect a psychological paralysis created by God’s judgment (v. 18). Alongside the sad conditions of a future with rationed sustenance (4:9–17), Ezekiel addresses those who may have believed they had the resources to mitigate the scarcity and economic woes of a siege. The affluence of the wealthy could not possibly assuage the wrath of God (7:19; cf. Zeph. 1:18).

The defilement (Ezek. 7:21–22, 24; cf. Lev. 20:3) of the land and sanctuary created two major problems. First, if the very system of maintaining the holiness of God placed among the people turned sour, how was Israel to abide in God’s presence? Second, if the temple and its ritual activity were defiled, how was forgiveness to be mediated? Israel’s world and worldview would be shattered.

The prophets, priests, and kings stood as covenant mediators and as political operatives in God’s political and ritual economy. Confusion and chaos within the confines of Israel’s leadership meant that access to the divine word and its corporate blessing were unavailable. As if this was not bad enough, God Himself took responsibility for the profanation of His temple and land (Ezek. 7:22; 24:21). He would bring the worst, the most despicable people, to displace them from their beloved home and take their accoutrements of covenant life with Yahweh (e.g., strangers and foreigners, the wicked of the earth, robbers, and the most evil of the Gentiles; 7:21–24; cf. 2 Kin. 25). The principle of retribution was working here. The people had committed murder (i.e., bloodguilt) and violence, so they in turn would experience the same (Ezek. 7:23, 27; cf. vv. 1, 8).

8:1—11:25

THE GLORY OF GOD WITHDRAWS FROM THE TEMPLE

The structure of chapters 8–11 is framed as a literary chiasm supported by a cadre of parallel words and themes.

- A Introduction (8:1–4)
- B Abomination: the problem (8:5–18)
- C Judgment on land and leadership (chap. 9)
- D God’s glory to abandon the temple (chap. 10)
- C’ Judgment on land and leadership (11:1–13)
- B’ Abomination: the solution (11:14–21)
- A’ Conclusion (11:22–25)

This second major vision details the story of the abandonment of the temple by God. Each section explains, expands, or resolves the preceding section as it moves to the central focus of the catastrophic reality: God leaving Jerusalem (D). Learning that God Himself would leave the place where all hope, forgiveness, worship, prayer, and wisdom were centered would leave a dim sense of meaning in life.

The significance of the theophany in chapter 1 now unfolds as it relates to the sanctuary, to judgment, and to God’s presence. Both the introduction and conclusion (A, A’) focus on the glory of God (8:4; 11:22–23), both indicate that the Spirit lifted Ezekiel up and took him somewhere in a vision (8:3; 11:24), and both focus on a previous vision (8:4b; 11:25). The account of the intervening vision paints a doleful picture of the people's condition. But there is also a note of hope: God was moving to Babylon with the exiled community! He had not totally abandoned His people. After His revival and restoration of His true people, He would return to Jerusalem (43:1-5).

God's departure (chaps. 8-11) and return (chaps. 40-48) to His restored temple indicate that judgment was not God's final word for His people. The theme of divine abandonment frequently occurs in ancient Near Eastern writings, where usually the military defeat of a people by another nation is interpreted to mean that their gods had abandoned them or that the gods of the enemy had defeated their gods. In the OT, however, Yahweh abandons His temple because of the people's moral failures, covenant breaches, and faithless compromises with pagan ideologies and rituals. In this OT context, God is not conquered; His people are conquered by sin, and the judgment against them is the Babylonian Exile (cf. Hab. 1:5-11).

The importance of Ezekiel 8-11 for the message of the Bible cannot be overemphasized. The account in these chapters of the investigation and execution of judgment on the faithless was related initially to Ezekiel's immediate audience and location, but its application has resonances for our time as well. John the Revelator presents a number of parallels with this vision in Ezekiel and shows that the work of judgment applies to the whole of creation (see "Judgment in Ezekiel and Revelation," p. 986).

8:1-18

Abominations in the Temple

After describing his visionary experience (vv. 1-4), Ezekiel utilizes a repetitive fourfold pattern that reaches its climax in a description of utter abomination (vv. 5-6, 7-13, 14-15, 16-18). The Spirit brought Ezekiel to and guided him through the temple complex (vv. 5, 7, 14, 16), addressed him as "son of man" (vv. 5-6, 8, 12, 15, 17), asked him to see what was happening (vv. 5-7, 9, 12, 15, 17), and guaranteed that the worst was yet to come (vv. 6, 13, 15).

8:1-4. Visions of God. Over a year's time, Ezekiel had performed a prophetic street ministry and had spoken what appeared to be discouraging words to the inhabitants of Jerusalem and the exiles. God's dialogues, earlier with

Judgment in Ezekiel and Revelation

A brief comparison with Revelation 14 makes clear that John's language parallels Ezekiel's account of the vision, yet the Revelation account involves the people of God from every nation, kindred, tongue, and tribe. The parallels help readers of Revelation to understand that God's plan and methods have not changed; He expects His professed people to live by His righteousness. This will lead to faithful obedience and will glorify His name. The parallels include the following:

- Judgment/vindication at the sanctuary: Ezek. 8:3 (Jerusalem); Rev. 14:1, 15 (heavenly Mount Zion).
- Six messengers of judgment: Ezek. 9:2; Rev. 14:6, 8-9, 15, 17-18.
- Seal of God/mark of the righteous/wicked: Ezek. 9:4; Rev. 7:3; 9:4; 14:1, 9.
- The wicked are killed: Ezek. 9:6-8; Rev. 14:10, 19-20.

- The righteous are saved: Ezek. 9:4; Rev. 14:1-5, 14-16.

In Revelation, conditions have not radically changed from those of Ezekiel's time. In both accounts, the righteous exhibit the same call to faithfulness while they express sorrow for the condition of God's people (Ezek. 9:4; Rev. 6:9-11), and the wicked engage in the same sins (idolatry, Ezek. 8:3, 14; Rev. 14:10-11; defiling God's sanctuary, Ezek. 8:7-13; Rev. 11; cf. Dan. 8:9-12; sun worship, Ezek. 8:16; Rev. 14:6-10; and injustice, Ezek. 9:9; Rev. 18). As in Ezekiel's day, in our time God's activity results in judgment and in the revelation of His justice. Revelation 14 also uses imagery and language from the judgment section of Ezekiel (chaps. 4-24): the cup of wrath (Ezek. 23; Rev. 14) and the vine of the land (Ezek. 15; Rev. 14:18-20). The two books complement one another and bring out issues of present relevance for our thoughts and prayers.

Jeremiah about Israel's exile (Jer. 7:1-34) and subsequently with Ezekiel about Israel's final destruction (Ezek. 12:21-28), indicate a hard-hearted rejection of God's word by the people (3:5-7). Now God was giving the elders of Israel a final confirmation of Ezekiel's prophetic calling through a visionary experience, which they later would be told involved Jerusalem and the temple (8:4; 11:25).

8:5-18. God Who Sees. God's questions to Ezekiel and the description of Israel's apostasy appear in Ezekiel's book, depicting the activity of the people. Twice Nebuchadnezzar had come and decimated Judah's population as God had announced, but the people continued to be engaged in the very practices that called forth God's judgment. God clarified now that not only would judgment come, but these abominations were driving Him far away from His sanctuary. In the daily ministration of the sacrifices, the confessed sins of the people were forgiven as the blood was shed and the priest made atonement (Lev. 1-7). In the yearly ministration, the sanctuary itself was cleansed (Lev. 16). The only known cases of unforgiven sin were of unconfessed sin and high-handed sin (deliberate, intentional, and defiant; Num. 15:30). So, God leaving His defiled sanctuary implies that the people's sins were unconfessed and/or high-handed.

For now, God took up residence in the temple to begin His covenant lawsuit against the people (cf. Ps. 50; Amos 2:9-16) that included, per typical form, a summons (Ezek. 8:1-5a), a trial (vv. 5b-17), and a sentence (v. 18). Ezekiel specifically describes four types of abominations (vv. 4-6, 7-13, 14-15, 16-18) that God prohibited. The description of the divergences from His revealed character and will could not be more vivid. The abominations were connected in some way with Israel's misconstrued theology of God's presence and the denial of the prospect of divine abandonment. First, not only were they breaking the first commandment by making an image or idol of jealousy (or an idol arousing God's jealousy; vv. 3, 5; Ex. 20:4-6; Deut. 4:16; 2 Chr. 33:7), but it was placed in the temple precinct as a rival to the glory of God. Second, God had revealed Himself as the Creator of all things (Gen. 1-2) and as the Holy One of Israel (Is. 1:4; 12:6). His holiness was being defiled by the engravings of unclean animals and idols (Lev. 7:21) and by the unholy worship of creation. Similar things have been observed in Egyptian burial chambers, and Israel did engage in religious syncretism with Egypt (Ezek. 16:16). As in times past, the elders of Israel probably incorporated in their worship the rituals of idol worship and the religious practices of the nations from which they sought help (cf. 11:12; 2 Kin. 16:10-20). Especially evident was their pro-Egyptian attitude (cf. Is. 30-31; Jer. 37:5-10), their proud mindset against the Lord, and their denial of His judgment and omniscience (Ezek. 8:12). Third, the worship of Tammuz (called dumuzi, "the good/proper son" in Sumerian), a Mesopotamian god widely honored as a god of vegetation and who was also the lover and consort of Inanna/Ishtar, was instituted most likely as a response to the scarcity of agricultural produce (cf. Is. 3:1-2). The women's lamentations (Ezek. 8:14) reveal a religious syncretism associated with an annual ritual mourning practice concerning the death of the deity. Some in Israel, besieged and exiled, interpreted God's supposed absence (v. 12) as a reason to compromise the true worship of the Lord instead of confessing and repenting of their sins in submission to God and His will. Finally, in front of the temple between the porch and the altar, there were twenty-five men worshiping the sun in the east (the Babylonian god Shamash, who was worshiped primarily as the "lord of judgment"). This was the place where they should have come before the Lord to seek forgiveness (cf. Joel 2:17).

The people had unquestionably turned their backs on the Lord physically and spiritually as they worshiped the sun (Jer. 32:33-35), and the result was rebellion and violence in the city (Ezek. 9:9). Apparently the people wanted the benefits of God's presence without accepting and yielding to God's lordship (Jer. 27:12, 17; 38:17-18).

9:1-11. Judgment on Land and Leaders.

In Ezekiel's vision, God gave His verdict. The compromising religious activities of the people (8:18) were connected to God's response in judgment. Though He would later judge the nations (chaps. 25-32), God began His judgment at His house, among the leaders and at the place where the professed people of God congregated. By standing at the bronze altar (9:2), God started in the area where the twenty-five elders would have been. He specifically started with the leaders (chaps. 12-14) as His representatives. The writing angel would put a mark on the foreheads of those who would be saved (9:3-4). God always has an authentic remnant who are faithful to Him and who also show reverence to His holiness (i.e., those who are disturbed by and mourn over all the abominations done in the land, v. 4).

God's command to execute without pity and without mercy (v. 5) may seem hard-hearted to modern ears, but divine love shows divine patience for as long as God's holiness allows. God put up with numerous impenitent, rebellious, and heartless kings and with injustice, oppression, idolatry, cruelty, commandment-breaking, stubbornness, and selfishness from His people for almost four centuries. He continually sent them messages of warning and hope, but there was no consistent response of faith and trust. Sin had run its course, and the cancerous heart of rebellion had to be rooted out (cf. Gen. 15:12–16) so that God's faithful ones could continue to bear witness to His glory. Ezekiel's response of intercession (Ezek. 9:8) shows a depth of covenant care (cf. 11:13) seen in the lives of faithful leaders like Moses (Ex. 32:30–34), Daniel (Dan. 9:1–19), and Paul (Rom. 9:1–2), and without equal in the life of our Savior, Jesus (Luke 23:34–43).

10:1—11:25

Abandonment of God's Temple

Echoing his earlier vision, Ezekiel alternates between God's movement toward and away from the entrance of the temple and the movement of the cherubim. The phrase "I looked" (10:1, 9) divides chapter 10 in two sections. Verses 1–8 focus on God's movement toward the temple and His purifying work, while vv. 9–22 depict the glory of God and the cherubim as Ezekiel describes God's departure from the

The Mark/Sign/Seal of God

In times of national importance, God has always had a sign to distinguish His faithful people from those who simply claim His name without the fruit of faith (Ezek. 9:4; cf. 20:12, 20; Exod. 12:23; Eph. 1:13; Rev. 7:2; 14:6–12). The mark (Heb. taw, the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet) is a divine sign of ownership, identity, and faithfulness and is placed on the forehead (Deut. 6:8).

1. Sabbath as a Sign. The Sabbath is a seal of God because it carries the title (Creator), territory (the world), and the authoritative name of the Lord (Yahweh, your God). In Exodus 20 the fourth commandment is the only command that relays and emphasizes these aspects of a seal (Ex. 20:8–11). It is a visible sign of faithfulness to God's authority and all of His revealed will. The Sabbath is a sign that recognizes that God is the Creator who blesses and sanctifies (Gen. 2:3), is Sovereign Lord (Mark 2:27–28) as well as Redeemer, and gives us true rest (Heb. 4:9–13). Genesis 2:3 emphasizes the sanctifying agency of the Lord, who blessed the seventh day and sanctified it—i.e. made it holy, and set it apart as special. Those who faithfully worship God in time (Sabbath) and space (holiness) belong to God by creation and redemption, and they acknowledge His lordship in their lives. The disciples' postresurrection Sabbath observance indicates that they did not understand the Sabbath to be replaced by another day, but that they had in fact found a deeper meaning to the Sabbath in light of Christ's life, death, and resurrection (Acts 13:27, 42, 44; 15:21; 16:13; 17:2; 18:4). In this regard, the Sabbath will continue to serve as a "sign" between God and His people (Ezek. 20:20; Ex. 31:12–17).

2. Eschatological Seal. In Revelation 7:2–3 John uses imagery similar to that in Ezekiel 9:3–4. God's end-time people have two main identifying marks that set them apart as His covenant people: (1) they have the faith of/in Jesus (the gospel), and (2) they keep all His commands (Rev. 12:17; 14:12). In Ezekiel 9, the sealed ones are persons who are faithful and keep God's commands, mourning over all the abominations in Judah (v. 4). In the first of the three angels' messages found in Revelation 14:6–12, an allusion is made to the Sabbath in connection with worship and the time of universal judgment (Rev. 14:7). Thus, there are important parallels between the sign/seal of God in Ezekiel and John: worship/Sabbath and judgment (Ezek. 20:12, 20; cf. the linguistic parallels between Exod. 20:8–11 and Rev. 14:6). Moreover, if the Sabbath, with its call to worship, encapsulates the commandments of God—in that observing it expresses one's love for God and recognition of His ownership—then the saints with the "faith of Jesus" who "keep the commandments" (Rev. 14:12) are those who will also observe the Sabbath.

temple complex. Chapter 11 also divides into two sections: judgment on land and leadership (vv. 1–13) and the question of a remnant (vv. 14–25).

10:1–22. The Lord Departs. Ezekiel interrupts his narrative about the man in linen with a description of the presence of God, moving from a scene of destruction to a scene of God's glory (v. 1; cf. 1:26; 43:7). The glory of God and His royal prerogatives must always be kept central to our understanding of judgment and salvation. God's command to the man in linen in 10:2 reminds us that the purging of the wicked is a part of God's judgment activity (cf. Rev. 8:5; 20:7–15). In this case, the fire represents Babylon's destruction of Jerusalem and the removal of the people from the land (cf. 2 Kin. 25:9).

Ezekiel clarifies that the four living beings he saw were cherubim (Ezek. 14–17, 20; cf. 1:10; 1 Kin. 6:29–35). His understanding of God's sovereignty as displayed in the sanctuary and its rituals enabled him to appreciate God's royalty and holiness and how human sinfulness is a revolt against Him. He also began to perceive the relationship between the earthly pattern and its heavenly reality (typology; cf. Ex. 25:8, 40). It was no longer just a vision of grand proportions; Ezekiel saw that God is the King, and the significance of the vision he saw at the beginning was clarified. In language reminiscent of the inauguration of the sanctuary (Ex. 40:34–38) and the temple (1 Kin. 8:10–11), Ezekiel describes a divine de-inauguration (i.e., abandonment) of the temple. It would not function as the site of God's sovereignty and place of atonement until after the Exile (cf. Ezra 6:13–22). Israel's disobedience and idolatry had pushed away God's holy presence, and He was ready to leave, granting them what they wanted.

Describing the functional importance of his earlier vision of the wheels (Ezek. 10:9–17; cf. 1:15–21), Ezekiel focuses on the departure of God's glory from the temple (10:18–19). The people had forsaken God—His kingship, His plan of salvation, His ethical guidance, and His wisdom for social justice (cf. 2 Kin. 21; 23:31–24:20)—and now Ezekiel's vision presented God as abandoning them.

11:1–13. Judgment on Land and Leadership. The vision continued as God acquainted Ezekiel with the activity of the leaders and its influence on the people (v. 2). The leaders were expected to guide the people and teach them the will of God, but Jaazaniah (“the Lord hears”) and Pelatiah (“the Lord rescues”) did not follow through on their holy calling. They are characterized as wolves destroying lives (v. 6; 22:27). The evil schemes of the powerful led them to seize the houses of those who were already exiled (cf. Is. 5:8; Mic. 2:1–2).

The rule of King Zedekiah (597–586 B.C.) and the oracles in Ezekiel 12–14 about the leaders, who apparently were mulling over their course of action in light of Babylonian oppression, provide the historical backdrop for this occasion. Vacillating Zedekiah naively believed the rebellious war party in Judah, who trusted that Egypt would help them and refused to trust in God. The sudden death of Pelatiah validated God's message (Ezek. 11:13). Through divine judgment the people would know that God is the Lord (vv. 11–12; cf. Phil 2:9–11). Ezekiel's reaction is instructive to Christians. On the one hand, our proclamation of the judgment message ought to cause us to reflect as we seek to understand and live out God's justice in the community. On the other hand, we need to understand that God is holy, just, and true to His word, and He will work out His purposes in harmony with His character. His constant attention to Israel, His overwhelming and undeserved care, and His protection and providence were, and often are, met with unbelief, disbelief, and willful rebellion. God calls humanity to Himself and appeals to us not to harden our hearts (Ps. 95:7–11; Heb. 3:7–19), for He must be true to His holy, just, and true character.

11:14–25. Solution to the Abomination; but Not Yet. In His continued dialogue with Ezekiel, God answered his question about the “remnant” (v. 13). In Isaiah the remnant are (1) a penitent group who would return to God and to the land (Is. 7:3; 10:20–22; 11:10–16; 17:5–8; 28:5; 30:17–19; 37:4, 31–32; cf. 6:13), (2) the survivors who would be the foundation of the renewed community (Is. 1:25–26), and (3) those called to a fruitful life as the people of Yahweh (Is. 4:2–6). Ezekiel was concerned about the possibility that the righteous remnant would be wiped out with the wicked (Ezek. 11:13). God responded with one of the greatest pictures of divine love: though His people were removed and scattered from the land, God would go into exile with them (cf. Ex. 25:8, 40). He also addressed what would have been a main concern for any displaced Israelite, namely, the future of the land. God promised a reversal; the faithful would be restored to the land, for He would gather His people out of exile (Ezek. 11:17), but not for a return to “things as usual.” Idols would be removed, new hearts would be implanted, and the covenant would be renewed: they would be His people, and He would be their God (v. 20). This is a theme that permeates the whole book (e.g., 14:11; 36:28; 37:27).

At the end of the vision, the glory of God lifted off from within the city and exited to the east, toward what later would be known as the Mount of Olives (11:22–23). For Ezekiel, it was a vision of God’s grandeur and Judah’s defeat, but also a vision of hope for the remnant. Now that Ezekiel had received the message, His prophetic task would deliver all of God’s messages to those in captivity (v. 25).

12:1—14:23

COUNTERFEIT LEADERSHIP REBUKED

Now that Yahweh had abandoned His temple, the people were open to the assaults of the surrounding nations. Yet the main concern of the Lord was the failure of the leaders of His people. They either tried to inculcate a false sense of security through false messages, or they encouraged the mixing of pagan ideas and rituals with the true worship of God. Ezekiel’s account begins by describing the wicked leaders as the main culprits for Judah’s demise: the prince (chap. 12), false prophets (chap. 13), and idolatrous elders (chap. 14).

12:1–28

Portrayal of Judah’s Captivity

The storyline follows Ezekiel’s sign-act (vv. 1–7), its interpretation (vv. 8–16), its effects (vv. 17–20), the leaders’ foolish thinking (vv. 21–25), and God’s response (vv. 26–28). Ezekiel uses a repetitive pattern to establish the certainty and implications of the Exile. Israel refused the knowledge of God that was given through His wise words and ways (Deut. 4:5–8), and now they would know who He is through judgment.

12:1–7. Ezekiel Is a Sign: The Rebellious House. Ezekiel first summarizes his prophetic drama by stating God’s word that the people among whom he was living were rebellious (vv. 1–2). The emphasis on Israel as a rebellious people recapitulates the result of God’s previous investigation into Israel’s condition. Israel lacked the spiritual discernment of sight and listening, though they had the physical senses to see the signs of the times and hear the message of judgment. Israel was unresponsive to God’s overtures of grace—the same problem addressed by Isaiah (Is. 6:9–10) and alluded to by Jesus Himself about the majority of the people in His day (Matt. 13:13–15).

Ezekiel packed his bags and left home. The sign-act describes how the leaders (Ezek. 12:10) would try to avoid the consequences of their rebellion. It appears that it was not readily clear to his audience just what Ezekiel was doing by carrying his baggage (v. 9), but the interpretation in vv. 8–16 shows that He was acting out a direct prophecy. An exile’s baggage probably included only the scantiest essentials: a skin for water, a mat for sleeping, and a container for food. The drama juxtaposes two realities: the certainty of exile and the dogged desire to escape it (vv. 5–6).

12:8–16. Prophecy and the Prince. As a sign to the people, all the prophet’s acts (i.e., digging through the wall, carrying this baggage, going out at dusk, covering his face, and not seeing the land; v. 7) would meet their historical fulfillment in Nebuchadnezzar’s siege of Jerusalem and Zedekiah’s attempt to flee. The experience of Zedekiah is specified in that he would not be able to see Babylon (v. 12; cf. 2 Kin. 25:7). The exiles were assured of the divine agency while being depicted as beasts of prey (Ezek. 12:13–14). As a result of the experience of judgment, the people would know who Yahweh is (v. 15, cf. Ex. 6:1–2). The judgment remained the same; God would scatter His people because of their rebellion. Ezekiel had explicitly stated the destructive means in the final exile and connected his description with earlier statements (sword, famine, plague, Ezek. 12:16; cf. 5:12; 6:11; 7:15). The fulfillment of his prophetic message affirmed to the exiled community that his messages were from the Lord (cf. 2:5). But at this stage in their rebellion, they doubted the immediacy and authenticity of the message (12:21–25).

12:17–20. Fear and Trembling. Ezekiel acted out another scene of the psychological effects of judgment. To make the action prophecy realistic, we can picture Ezekiel shaking and trembling to the point that he could barely get any food or drink in his mouth (v. 18). Reminiscent of the siege rations from 4:10–11, the people of Jerusalem and the land of Israel would eat and drink with anxiety and horror (12:19). Invading armies often took the crops and livestock of the inhabitants, so the concerns of those remaining would not be focused on real estate (11:15) but on the preservation of life itself. Since the land would be desolated, it would be impossible for the people to find security in politics, economic stability, and religious history. Israel's hopes, purpose, identity, and pride were attached to the land. Not only would most of the people be exiled from it, but the remaining few would not be able to sustain the land, the traditions, or the corporate worship system; the land would lie in ruins (cf. Lev. 26:14–16).

Contrary to some popular uses of these “scattering and gathering” passages in end-time scenarios, no rapture of the church will occur secretly with the lost left behind. As in Israel's history, at the end of time God's judging of the wicked entails Him turning their fortunes into rubble (Rev. 18:9–24). In the execution of judgment at Christ's coming (Rev. 19:11–16), there will be only death for the wicked (Rev. 19:17–21). John presents the finale of God's judgment for the rebellious in the end as being not a second chance in a renewed Israel but only the second death (Rev. 20:11–15).

12:21–28. The Lord Will Speak and It Shall Happen. The validity of Ezekiel's visions and sign-acts were doubted on two counts. First, the people thought Ezekiel's words would come to nothing since nothing had happened yet (v. 22; cf. 2 Pet. 3:3–4). The prophets were often seen as doomsayers and alarmists. A few years earlier, Jeremiah had experienced the same kind of denial (Jer. 5:12), even receiving physical blows because of his perceived pessimistic message (Jer. 27:12–28:11). It had only been about six years since the exiles were deported in 597 B.C., and only a year into Ezekiel's ministry (Ezek. 1:2; 8:1), yet proverbs had already developed discounting God's warning. Even Isaiah and Micah had spoken about the coming Exile, and the people replied with cynicism and doubt (Is. 5:19; Mic. 3:11). Jeremiah indicated that the people's belief in their status as the chosen people in God's appointed place would not save them from destruction if they failed to amend their ways (Jer. 7:4). Some of the leaders in Jesus's time had the same mentality, misunderstanding His relationship to the temple as well as their own to the point that they were ready to condemn Him and commit murder (cf. Matt. 12:6, 14; Mark 14:57–58; John 2:19). Second, the people intimated that prophecy was irrelevant to them since it was related to times far in the future (Ezek. 12:27). They did not doubt that biblical prophecy was real, only that its fulfillment was so far away that it was of little consequence to their immediate lives.

The institutions, buildings, and leadership roles were a means to an end—not a religious talisman that proved divine acceptance and protection irrespective of their relationship to God. The false vision or flattering divination (v. 24) apparently had been successful in its intended effect. Whether the cause was false prophetic proclamations or false hopes, the result was an environment of religious deception. God had given instructions on how to relate to prophetic sayings (Deut. 13:1–5) and how to avoid judgment through repentance (cf. Jer. 18:1–11; Jon. 3:4–10). God's spoken promise (Ezek. 12:25, 28) that the deceptive proclamations would cease was a response to the cynicism of the leaders and the people. He would bring judgment on the false prophets as announced in the next chapter.

13:1–23

Prophecy against the Prophets

Beginning a series of seven woes (vv. 3, 18; 16:23; 24:6, 9; 34:2), Ezekiel's message addresses male prophets who were lying about having received a divine word (13:1–16) and female prophets who were engaging in obscure magical practices (vv. 17–23). Two major problems are addressed: (1) the character of God's prophetic leading and (2) the reliability of the prophetic message. The nature of prophecy is integral to understanding the sanctuary judgment message in Ezekiel (chaps. 8–11) and the eschatological prophecy found in the book of Daniel and the NT. It was important for the people of God to have a true understanding of how God was leading His people through the prophetic message and its ethical component. Because people make moral choices based on their understanding of prophecy, false prophecy always poses an obstacle to the clarity of God's purposes and expectations.

True biblical prophecy is of upmost importance because it helps to keep holy living in a broader context (Matt. 24:4–5, 11; Rev. 10:7; 22:6). The words of some false prophets and leaders in Israel are quoted and refuted in Ezekiel's account (Ezek. 8:12; 9:9; 11:3; 12:22, 27; 18:2, 19, 25, 29) because their false messages were leading the people astray. Their influence in the community added a persuasive power to their words, especially when they introduced their messages with “Hear the word of the LORD!” (13:2). God corrected the first problem of the false prophets’ claiming to represent Him to the people by clarifying that everyone would know who God is at the coming of judgment (vv. 9, 14, 21, 23). He addressed the second problem of the lies and false visions by having His own prophet, Ezekiel, state what would take place, in advance of its happening (cf. John 13:19).

13:1-16. Lies, Divination, and False Vision.

The words characterizing these false prophets’ visionary experiences (e.g., false, lie) describe the type of messages coming from private and, in this case, pernicious interpretations of events (v. 2; 2 Pet. 1:20-21). Instead of protecting and sealing the breaches with faithful messages from God, the false prophets’ lies were making use of the breaches like sly foxes or jackals in a vineyard, running about through the ragged walls and damaging the vine shoots (Ezek. 13:4; cf. Neh. 3:35; Song 2:15). Contrast this depiction with God’s command to Ezekiel to be a watchman warning of impending danger (Ezek. 3:17). The Lord specified that the deceptive nature of these prophets was expressed in two ways: (1) using the same religious language as God’s true prophets (13:6-7; cf. vv. 8, 16), and (2) engaging in spiritualism—a product of supernatural intervention—to give a semblance of accurate prediction that lacked a moral component.

Deuteronomy 13:1-5 establishes a miracle, sign, or accurate prediction as being no proof of God’s leading if it turns the people away from God’s revealed word (cf. Ex. 7:22; Rev. 16:13-14). God’s response was threefold: (1) the false prophets would not be a part of the assembly of leaders; (2) they would not be written in the civil list (census); and (3) they were not to come back to the land of Israel (Ezek. 13:8-9). These responses anticipated the final exile of 586 B.C. but clarified that the false leaders would not be a part of the restored community. False prophetic messages would be refuted because of their tendency either to promise things not in accordance with God’s word (v. 10, cf. Jer. 14:13-16) or because of their tendency to take financial advantage of the people of God with false messages (Ezek. 13:18-19; cf. Jer. 6:13-14; Titus 1:11). Their false messages were unstable like whitewashed (limestone mixed with water), flimsy walls: initially thought to provide comfort and stability, but truly exposed by judgment striking like a hurricane, hailstorm, and tsunami all at once (Ezek. 13:11-13; Deut. 13:6-18).

13:17-23. Witches, Witchcraft, and Wickedness. Several women served as prophetesses in Israel’s history: Miriam, Moses’s sister (Ex. 15:20); Deborah (Judg. 4:4); and Huldah (2 Kin. 22:14; 2 Chr. 34:22). It is important that Ezekiel does not call the women he was dealing with “prophetesses” (cf. Ex. 15:20; Judg. 4:4; Is. 8:3). By taking up the pagan practices of sewing magic charms, these women are more accurately called witches. The Hebrew word keset (meaning “bands, cushions”) in v. 18 is a term likely related to the Akkadian term for magic. Babylonian incantations involved magical knots and bonds and making veils (Heb. mispakhah, suggesting a special type of covering, possibly with an amulet used in magical rituals). The popular image of a dark, horned demon can be a misleading portrayal of the obviousness of the evils in witchcraft, which in fact is often presented in attractive wares, beautiful tapestry, and appealing artistic symbolism (GC 566-567). The moral purpose of prophecy is brought into view through the condemnation of wickedness and through God’s message calling His people to fidelity and obedience to His revealed will (Ezek. 13:22-23). The Hebrew term nepesh (which is used in vv. 18, 20) can have various meanings, including “emotions,” “thoughts,” “mental faculties,” “desires” (especially in poetic passages, e.g., 24:25; Job 24:12; Pss. 6:3; 13:2; 31:9; 42:4-6), and even sometimes “dead body” (see e.g., Num. 5:2; 9:6), and is sometimes translated as “souls.” In no case can it be said to denote a bodiless entity living within the body, which is a pagan idea. In this context it refers to the whole person.

14:1-23

Matters of the Heart

The theme of false prophecy is taken up again, this time with the elders of Israel in view. Though removed from Jerusalem, the problem remained: idolatrous hearts. Ezekiel associates the idolatry of the elders (“these men,” v. 3) with the deceptive message of the false prophets (vv. 4, 10). This indicates that the ones accepting the false message were not victims but were in a sense complicit in the deception because their hearts were not with God (cf. 2 Tim. 4:3-4).

14:1-11. They Shall Be My People. Ezekiel’s priestly training and prophetic calling helped him understand the relationship between prophetic proclamation and holy living. There are many linguistic parallels between this chapter and Leviticus 17–26 (esp. Lev. 17). Just as Israel was instructed about the sanctity and purity of life as they were moving into the promised land, so in Ezekiel they were instructed, as those who would go back to the promised land as the remnant, to repent and renounce their idols (Ezek. 14:6). Restoration is twofold: God called His people to return to Him in faithfulness and to turn away from idolatry.

Some of the elders did not see any problem with serving idols in their heart while at the same time going to God's designated spokesperson to hear God's word. But God would have none of their religious double-mindedness. He would "set His face against" such people. (cf. Lev. 20:6), and make the wicked a negative example (Ezek. 14:8; Deut. 28:37).

God said something seemingly strange (Ezek. 14:9), which was that in the case of a false prophet, He Himself had patah ("persuaded," "seduced," "enticed," or "deceived") that prophet. Since God is morally pure and cannot lie (Titus 1:2; Heb. 6:8), this should probably not be taken to mean "deceived"—at least not in an overly literal sense. God's involvement consisted of both establishing and permitting circumstances in which He knew the deception of already recalcitrant and rebellious people would occur, and He used these circumstances to bring about His will in their punishment (cf. Ezek. 14:9; 1 Kin. 22:19–23; Is. 63:17; 2 Thess. 2:11). These foolish prophets, who benefit from capitalizing on the fears of people with words of peace (Ezek. 13:10), would be destroyed by God; this is an announcement of complete annihilation (see Lev. 26:30). Yet judgment was not the final word, and herein lay an instructive warning to Ezekiel. He needed spiritual discernment because he had people with idolatrous hearts coming to him and seeking a word from God. God desired to restore His people to a faithful covenant relationship with Him, and consequently, He would see to it that false leaders would not make His people wander around like lost sheep (Ezek. 13:11; cf. chap. 34; John 10).

14:12–23. A Survivor Will Be Left. Denying any notion of corporate righteousness by proxy, God told His people not to rest their spiritual laurels on their heroes of the faith. He summarized the modes of punishment described earlier (vv. 12–23; cf. chaps. 5–7): famine (14:12–14), wild beasts (vv. 15–16), the sword (vv. 17–18), and pestilence or plague (vv. 19–20), which were part of the covenant curses (Lev. 26:22–26). Thus, He made the people's true condition clear to them. Reaffirming the terror of His just punishment (Ezek. 14:21), God then announced that He would preserve an unfaithful remnant from Jerusalem to be taken to Babylon. Their rebellious and corrupt way of life, even in exile, would demonstrate that the Lord was just in His judgment against Jerusalem. The Lord promised Ezekiel that by observing the evidence of rebellion in the former inhabitants of Jerusalem, he would be comforted knowing that the Lord did what was right (vv. 22–23).

The repetition of Noah, Daniel, and Job (vv. 14, 16, 18, 20) at the end of each section brings up two important practices in Israel's history: intercession by prayer and sacrifice, and the effect of the presence of the righteous. First, the prayers of intercession were an expression of righteousness. Job interceded for his children (Job 1:5). Daniel interceded for Jerusalem (Dan. 9). Noah also interceded for his family after the Flood, when he expressed his faith and offered a sacrifice as an act of atonement—an expiation for their sin (Gen. 8:20). But even those known for their righteous intercession could not rescue others from the judgment to come. Second, because the righteous found favor in the eyes of God, others also were delivered (Gen. 6:8; Job 1:1; Dan. 1:8, 17). But here Judah's sin was so ingrained and malignant that the intercession of the faithful would bring no healing balm (cf. Amos 7:1–9). The judgment is here stated as indeed final and, given the circumstances, unavoidable.

15:1—17:24

GOD'S PARABLES: A VINE, A SPOUSE, AND TWO EAGLES

Ezekiel uses three different parables about a useless vine, an unfaithful wife, and two eagles to show God's tender care and Israel's rebellious and ungrateful heart. Each chapter focuses on a different aspect of Israel's rebellion. The vine symbolizes what Israel should have been—full of life and fertile growth in righteousness as a witness to God's care for humanity (cf. Is. 5:1–7)—but it had become useless (cf. Jer. 2:21), ready for the fire.

The unfaithful wife depicts Israel's political and religious activities as shameless infidelity toward their covenant Lord (cf. Jer. 3:14). Ezekiel uses wisdom language from the book of Proverbs to describe the illicit lust of the adulteress woman, Folly (cf. Prov. 5; 6:20-35; 7; 9:13-18). Israel's rebellious ways reflected a rejection of the wisdom of God in establishing a faithful covenant relationship. The two divinely established institutions from Creation that are the target of Satan's ire are the Sabbath and marriage (between one man and one woman). When God's people break those vows of faith, hope, and love, His character is impugned in the sight of the nations and, more immediately, in the sight of their neighbors.

The parable of the two eagles and the vine shows the folly of rebelling against Babylon and seeking help from Egypt. Israel's history is fraught with unfaithfulness. They broke their covenant with God, and without God's grace and lordship, Israel had no reason or power to be faithful to their commitments. These three chapters are held together by a repetitive formula: "The word of the LORD came to me": "Son of Man..." This section shows the recalcitrance of rebellious hearts even in the face of divine grace and providence.

15:1-8

Israel, a Useless Vine

Like other writers of the Hebrew Bible, Ezekiel depicts Israel using the floral imagery of a vine, a symbol of God's care and of His plan to make Israel a blessing to the nations (Ps. 80:8-11; cf. Gen. 12:1-3). This chapter begins with a graphic depiction of God's judgment resulting in the demise of His people as worthless wood (Ps. 80:12-13; Jer. 2:21). Not only had the people failed to live up to God's expectations, but they also had flagrantly rebelled against Him and His word. As the vine-dresser, God should not be blamed for moral evil. Jesus utilized this prophetic imagery multiple times: (1) a parable where pernicious weeds of rebellion would be consigned to the fires of judgment (Matt. 13:24-30); (2) a metaphor for the connection between Himself and His believers (John 15:1-8); and (3) the fruit of the vine to symbolize His blood (Matt. 26:27-29). John the Revelator also used the fruit of the vine as a metaphor for judgment (Rev. 14:18-20). God's plan was for His people to bear fruit (justice and righteousness; Is. 5:7), but when the spoiled fruit of oppression, selfishness, and idolatry was found, the vine was fit only for firewood.

16:1-63

Faithless Bride

Ezekiel continues to use different pictures to illustrate the development of Israel's apostasy.

While chapter 20 describes a cyclical picture, chapters 16 and 23 describe a picture of ever-increasing apostasy. As in Hosea, the image of Israel as God's wife shows the love God has for His people. Sadly, His love was often spurned and not reciprocated. Ezekiel uses lewd and almost sexually explicit imagery to describe Israel's infidelity to Yahweh. The metaphor of whoredom expresses Israel's false worship (16:15-18), and her paramours, the pagan nations, represent the political associations Israel made instead of trusting in God's abiding presence and revealed will (vv. 26-32).

16:1-14. Israel Abandoned but Adopted.

After being given a summary statement of his mission to make the capital city aware of their abominations (v. 2), Ezekiel was commanded first to show what Israel had abandoned. After calling attention to the ethnic origins of the Hebrew people (v. 3), God reminded them that their present status as God's people was an act of grace. During the time of the Exodus, the Canaanites, Amorites, and Hittites would be displaced once Israel entered into the land (Ex. 3:8, 17; 23:23; 33:2; Deut. 7:1; 20:17) in fulfillment of God's promise to Abraham (Gen. 13:14). Their displacement was also a judgment on them because of their deplorable ways, not because of ethnic inferiority (Gen. 15:15-21; 1 Kin. 21:26).

Ezekiel uses a motif common in the ancient Near East in which an abandoned child found in the open country is adopted and cared for. This serves as a rebuke and a tribute. In several societies in the ancient world, the exposure of unwanted babies, especially girls, was an alternative to birth control. This unwanted baby that God rescued reminded Ezekiel's audience of their historical deliverance from slavery to adoption and pointed toward God's ability to once again free His people from the bondage of exile and restore them to Himself as His children. Israel's adoption was a prominent marker of divine election that brought the nation into a covenant relationship with Him (Ezek. 16:8). This gracious act of the adoption of an enslaved nation was later utilized by NT authors to describe the special status of the people of God who were redeemed by the sacrificial work of Jesus (Rom. 8:14-17; Gal. 4:4-7; Eph. 1:5-6). Israel's growth from wilderness wanderers to a thriving monarchy during David's and Solomon's reigns is depicted as a young woman's development into a beautifully adorned queen (Ezek. 16:9-14).

16:15–34. Israel's Harlotry and Adultery.

But Israel became a harlot and engaged in foreign, anti-Yahweh practices: (1) false worship at shrines (vv. 16–19; cf. Prov. 7:16–17); (2) filicide (i.e., killing one's child; Ezek. 16:20–23; cf. Lev. 18:21; 1 Kin. 11:5); and (3) making illegitimate covenants with the surrounding major powers—Egypt, Assyria, and Babylon (Ezek. 16:24–30). Isaiah warned Judah repeatedly against seeking alliances with Egypt in order to resist Assyria, but his warnings went unheeded (2 Kin. 18:21–24; Is. 30–31) even though they knew such a plan had not worked for the Northern Kingdom (2 Kin. 17:1–5). Judah's alliance with Assyria refers to Ahaz's appeals to Assyria for help against the Syro-Ephraimite coalition and the Northern Kingdom of Israel in the eighth century (2 Kin. 16:1–9; Is. 7:1–9). The interaction with Babylon (Ezek. 16:29) probably refers to Hezekiah's foolish interaction with the Babylonian envoys (Is. 39:1–8) and later kings' alliances with Babylon (2 Kin. 24).

The vulgar description of the people of God acting as an insatiable prostitute (Ezek. 16:15–17, 26, 28)—engaged in idolatry, spiritualism, and covenant infidelity—provides a background for the description of the unfaithful people of God in the book of Revelation (Rev. 17:1–14). The faithful people of God are described as chaste (James 1:27; Rev. 14:4; cf. Heb. 13:4). The adulterous ways of a harlot are used to describe how God's people turn their backs on Him to serve other gods. Just as in Ezekiel's time God's people became enamored with paganism and God appealed to them to come out of that false religious system, so in Revelation the true people of God are called to turn from their spiritual adultery, come out of spiritual Babylon, and return to true worship that is centered in the Creator and covenant faithfulness (Jer. 50:8; 51:6, 45; Rev. 18:1–4).

Israel's harlotry was worse because normally prostitution resulted from economic privation, but Israel had all God's blessings, even royalty. Prostitute Israel did not take payment for their services; they gave the payment (Ezek. 16:30–34) in the form of God's material blessings for erecting idolatrous practices in defiance of their covenant Lord (cf. Deut. 23:18). The end-time harlot depicted in the book of Revelation goes one step further to become the worldwide epicenter of spiritualism (Rev. 18:1–3), arrogance and cruelty (Rev. 18:4–8), and political and economic depravity (Rev. 18:9–20). God's call is the same in Ezekiel: come out of her and cease following her ways!

16:35–43. O Prostitute, Hear the Word of the Lord. Israel's debauchery exposed them to paganism and did not lead to fruitful results. Most pagan deities were connected with nature in some fashion, and agricultural produce was a sign of the deities' blessing. Israel's self-imposed bondage to ungodly acts stemmed in large part from their confused beliefs about God. Their intention to manipulate God through rituals, like that of the surrounding nations, was met with divine wrath. Because Israel trusted in false deities, Yahweh would allow them to be returned to the state in which He found them in order to show Israel what those false deities would do for them (v. 39; cf. vv. 7, 22). Like Israel, God would mobilize those nations, but for different purposes. Because of capital offenses like adultery (Lev. 20:10) and the shedding of blood (Deut. 19:11–12), the people deserved to die, and God would bring judgment, but in all this His purposes were redemptive.

16:44–59. Samaria, Sodom, and Hypocrisy.

Israel's defection from God was so thorough that there was no difference between them and the surrounding nations. The saying "Like mother, like daughter" was an appropriate one (v. 44). The mother (Hittite) represents the heathen Canaanites, and the sister (Israel) is associated with Sodom (vv. 44–46; Gen. 19:1–29; Is. 1:15). The people of Judah had surpassed the notoriously infamous and immoral Sodomites and the people of the Northern Kingdom of Israel (Ezek. 16:47). God's objection to Judah and Israel was that they strove to be like the pagan nations. The implication was that Yahweh was just another localized deity, one among others. Whenever conceptions of God are brought down to the level of human machinations, He makes it clear that He has no equal (20:9; 39:7; Is. 45:20–21; 46:5–13; 48:9–11). God's original plan was for Israel to be a light on a hill to the nations, an illustration of God's rule of justice and righteousness (Deut. 28:1–14; 1 Kin. 3:1–15). When God and His truth are disregarded, there is nowhere else to go but in a downward spiral of destruction (Ezek. 16:47–48). Spiritual rebellion has a social impact, and in Israel it took the form of the oppression of the vulnerable (poor and needy, v. 49; cf. Deut. 15:11) and spiritual pride (Ezek. 16:56–58).

16:60–63. God's Memory and Mercy. Memory plays an important role in the life of the people of God. When God said He would remember His covenant, it meant He would act in light of it

(v. 60). To establish the covenant meant to confirm and maintain something that already existed (vv. 60, 62; 34:20–31; cf. Gen. 6:18; 9:9, 11, 17; 17:7, 19, 21; 26:3). To remember their sins meant that Israel would feel ashamed and act in a way that would honor God. In both the OT and the NT—in type and antitype, in shadow and reality—restoration was made by atonement (Ezek. 16:63; Heb. 8–10).

17:1–24

Two Eagles and a Vine

Ezekiel is given a parable (vv. 1–10), its interpretation (vv. 11–21), and a parable reiteration with a statement of its consequences (vv. 22–24). A crucial question is raised throughout the chapter: “Will it thrive?” As Ezekiel brings back the metaphor of the house of Israel as the vine (cf. 15:2, 6) to comment on the political situation, he sets forth Judah’s imminent demise.

17:1–10. Great Eagles and the Vine. In the Bible, animals are used to symbolize important historical events (e.g., Dan. 7–8; Rev. 12–13; 17–20). Ezekiel’s symbolism points to his immediate circumstances to explain Judah’s folly. The words khidah (“riddle” or “allegory”; cf. Judg. 14:12–16) and mashal (“parable” or “proverb”; cf. Prov. 1:1; Eccl. 12:9) are used in wisdom contexts, and here they serve to reinforce Judah’s folly. Both words intimate a need for interpretation and introduce an allegorical story. By couching history in an enigmatic story, the people would be drawn initially into the plotline. The story, however, ends on a sour note. A beautiful eagle (or griffon vulture), known for its size and flying ability, took the top of the cedar (Ezek. 17:1–6). The irony of the eagle planting the topmost of the cedar’s young twigs is already a subtle indication of the presence of foreign elements. Dissatisfied with its condition, the now finely trestled vine turned its attention to another eagle (v. 7). With deadly claws, the first eagle would not accept a swap, especially since it helped the vine to grow (vv. 9–10).

17:11–21. Prophetic Riddles and Parables Explained. The first eagle stands for Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, who campaigned in Judah in 597 B.C. and took King Jehoiachin (the topmost of the cedar’s shoot; vv. 4, 12b) and his officials (v. 12) into exile (“city of merchants,” Babylon; v. 4). Zedekiah is probably the one referred to as the seed of the land (vv. 5, 12–13;

2 Kin. 24:15; 25:6). The planting of a vine by Nebuchadnezzar refers to his stratagem to reestablish the kingdom of Judah as a puppet client and buffer state against any Egyptian aggression. Branches turning to the eagle emphasize Judah’s vassal state under Babylon’s control. The second eagle most likely represents Pharaoh Psammetichus II of Egypt (595–589 B.C.). However, Judah’s hope was not Egypt (Jer. 27:1–22). The faith of God’s people must not rest in human wisdom and strength (cf. 1 Cor. 2:5). The prophet Daniel later made it clear that Babylon would be followed on the world stage by Media and Persia (Dan. 8:20). The wisdom of God is seen in His foreknowledge and proclaimed through prophecy, which serves to establish faith in His providence despite external circumstances (Is. 46:10).

17:22–24. Messianic Hope. God continued to show His sovereignty, entering the arena of politics and promising to set up His own royal leader. This is a messianic prophecy of a Davidic king originating from on high (v. 22). The branch, fruit, and splendor that earthly powers intended for Israel would come to naught (vv. 8–9), but the same characteristics would be fully displayed in God’s promised king (v. 23). Here, God is evidently the agent instead of the eagles, indicating that His will supersedes the machinations of earthly powers in the establishment of His king and kingdom (cf. 1 Sam 2:1–10; Dan. 2:34, 44–45). The influence of a foreign nation or king would not impede the fulfillment of this messianic promise, though Herod tried (Matt. 2).

18:1—23:49

ACCOUNTABILITY AND RETRIBUTION

Chapters 18–23 in a sense recapitulate Ezekiel’s criticism against the leadership of Judah (chaps. 12–14), but in a more specific and larger historical context. Because of the corporate exile of Judah, some of the people seemed to believe that they were the unjust victims of their fellow Israelites’ crimes. In several historical vignettes, God showed how all Israel benefitted from His gracious acts. At the same time, the promises of redemption and returning to the land were corporate. So the Exile was a response to the nation’s faithlessness. The innocent would suffer, but the others were guilty by sins of omission or commission, in word or deed, and by faithlessness or presumption. But in His gracious way, God would punish individuals for their own sins and save individuals by His grace as they trusted in Him.

18:1–32

The Righteous Shall Live; the Wicked Shall Die

Those in exile used a proverb to question God's fairness (vv. 2, 25). This catchy adage attempted to put the spotlight on God, and it garnered some popularity, as shown by its use in Jeremiah 31:29–30. God correctly put the spotlight back on the people, where it belonged. Like a petulant child, Judah refused to acknowledge their sins and brazenly accused God of being reckless in His execution of justice. God set the record straight by using irony to show these "righteous" people that the judgment was justified and that in His patience He had borne long with them.

18:1–18. If...Then. God, through an oath, stated that His assessment of the problem would bring clarity to the situation (v. 3). In chapter 14 it was noted that the righteous (Noah, Daniel, Job) could not mitigate the punishment of the wicked. In chapter 18, the focus is on individual responsibility, answering the question of whether children would be punished for the sins of their fathers. Three case studies are given to disprove the proverb: the righteous person (vv. 5–9); the wicked son (vv. 10–13); and the righteous son of a wicked father (vv. 14–18). The righteous person is described (vv. 5–9, 14–18) as one faithful to the covenant. Justice and righteousness show themselves in what a person avoids and by what people promote through their actions. The main issues that all three cases touch on are: (1) worship—pagan monuments, idol worship (v. 6); (2) sexual contact—sexual contact with a neighbor's spouse (v. 6; Ex. 20:14; Lev. 18:20), sexual ritual impurity (Ezek. 18:6; Lev. 18:19); (3) financial dealings—piling up bad debts, theft, exploitation of the vulnerable (Ezek. 18:7; Ex. 22:21), living by impulse and greed; and (4) legal disputes—considering one person better than another (Ezek. 18:8; Lev. 19:15). It is important to note that the passage presents the lives of the righteous son and father as in accordance with God's gracious revelation (Ezek. 18:9, 17), while the wicked son would die because of disobedience (v. 13). Notice that Ezekiel presents only the righteous as going beyond the prohibitions and promoting justice and acting with integrity (vv. 7–9, 17).

This includes feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and executing true justice with fairness and equity as an expression of what it means to worship God (cf. Ps. 5:3–8). Not just their behavior but their character is in view (Ezek. 18:9), and the righteous do what God loves (Ps. 33:5). Habits, dispositions, and the will express the heart's condition, for out of it flow the issues of life (Prov. 4:23).

18:19–32. Turn and Live! Justice and righteousness describe and define God's character from Genesis to Revelation. God wants His people to pursue justice and righteousness as a sign of submission to His lordship. The second commandment indicates that the immoral behavior of parents often carries negative results for children and grandchildren, whether by nurture or nature. The judgment applies to those who hate God and only to the third and fourth generations. So while this command describes the consequences for the disobedient and unbelieving, it focuses on God's mercy, especially in view of His steadfast love for thousands of those who love Him (Ex. 20:6). A misunderstanding of God's justice often leads to despair and doubt about His grace, love, holiness, and wisdom in the practical spheres of life. Ezekiel addresses two interconnected problems. First, though Scripture (including elsewhere in Ezekiel itself, e.g., 21:4; 23:46–49; 24:21) mentions many examples of children being punished for their parents' sins (e.g., Gen. 9; Ex. 12:29; Lev. 26:39–40; Josh. 6:26; 2 Sam. 12:14; cf. 2 Sam. 21; 1 Kin. 14:10; 16:34; 22:19–20; 2 Kin. 5:27; 23:26–27; Matt. 23:34–39), children will not ultimately and eternally bear their parents' guilt, and parents will not bear their children's guilt. Second, any wicked person can be transformed into a righteous person, while a righteous person can turn from his or her righteousness and commit iniquity (Ezek. 18:21–27; 33:18–19). In both instances, the person who sins is culpable for his or her own actions, and one's past does not dictate one's future.

Apparently the people did not want to be treated as individuals but were wrongly using the principle of familial guilt as an excuse to be fatalistically complacent in regard to their own guilt and sin. In 18:19, 25, and 29, the people objected.

Ezekiel uses the verb shub ("to turn," "repent," "restore") in several passages to show the nature of hope and of rebellion (vv. 21, 23–24, 26–28, 30, 32). True repentance includes a godly sorrow for sin as well as a turning from sin and selfishness to righteousness and holiness. God's command to repent, turn, and live (vv. 30, 32) was a call to Israel to surrender to God's authority as Creator and Father. Herein lies the biblical teaching of righteousness by faith. The call to life (vv. 9, 17, 21, 28, 32) is a call to embrace God and the gift of His holiness. He gives to His children a new heart and new spirit (v. 31; 37:22–32; cf. Ps. 51:7–12). His commands are indeed His enablings, for it is His love that seeks out human beings, honestly assesses their condition, and offers forgiveness, reconciliation, and sanctification. When individuals return to God, though they have been sinful, none of their sins will be remembered (Ezek. 18:22, 24). That God will not remember their rebellions, perversions, injustices, abominations, and treachery means that He will not treat them as sinners.

The question in v. 23 and the affirmations of v. 32 point to the depths of God's love and the sickness of the human heart. God seeks to save and not to destroy. He wants sinners to live. How will His people live? By (1) honoring God in obedience (v. 21); (2) turning from wicked ways (v. 23); and (3) doing justice and righteousness (v. 27). But the rebellious are disobedient and seem only to assail God and question His motives rather than their own (vv. 25, 29). Thus, the ultimate purpose in judgment is revealed: God wants His people to see what life is like without Him. The removal of His presence can only result in calamity (chaps. 8–11), but His abiding presence with His people results in abundant life (chaps. 40–48).

19:1–14. Lament for the Princes of Israel.

Ezekiel confronted his contemporaries by exposing them again to the reality of God's sovereignty over history. Two familiar images, the lion (cf. Gen. 49:8–12) and the vine (cf. Ezek. 15; 17; Is. 5:1–7), show the crisis of leadership in Judah (cf. Ezek. 17). The many literary connections with Jacob's words about Judah in Genesis 49:8–12, which are filled with the messianic promise, emphasize the failure of the Davidic kingship. Haggai and Zechariah would encourage the despairing hopes of the people to see God's promise to David realized. The coming of the messianic King would be fulfilled in Jesus (Matt. 9:27; 15:22; 20:21; 21:9; Mark 10:47; 12:35–37). Not only would this Davidic King rule over the earth, but even at this time He would reign over the hearts of His people in love and grace.

In the first section (Ezek. 19:1–9), the first lion, taken to Egypt, was Jehohaz (vv. 3–4; 2 Kin. 23:29–33; 609 B.C.). The second lion, taken to Babylon, was most likely Jehoiachin (Ezek. 19:5, 9; 2 Kin. 24:8–12; 598 B.C.), who is described in Ezekiel 17:2–4, 12 as one exiled to Babylon. Also, the text makes it clear that the mother lioness raised up the lion. The imagery of a mother represents Judah (19:2, 10), and the other lions are the other kingdoms of the world, the Gentile nations (vv. 2 [lions], 4 [nations], 6 [lions], 8 [nations]). The vine also represents the kingdom of Judah, which became a fruitful vine but was then uprooted in fury (vv. 10, 12). The focus on the activities of the lioness emphasizes that God was no longer being consulted about the kingship. In fact, as a result of God's judgment, foreign rulers were seemingly in control of the monarchy from 605 to 586 B.C. (cf. 2 Kin. 23:34; 24:17; Dan. 1:1). The image of the vine focuses on the Davidic dynasty and the branches represent their rulers. The parable describes how it was dismantled from its high estate and taken into exile.

The literary significance of chapter 18 is now brought into view. The placement of this chapter on individual responsibility—between chapters 17 and 19—shows God's justice and mercy being applied to the Davidic kings. Unfortunately, as the author of the book of Kings informs us, most of the kings did evil in the sight of the Lord. God's mercy and justice apply to all alike, regardless of status.

20:1–49

Rebellion, Revelation, and Redemption

As Ezekiel's timeline moves closer to the besiegment of Jerusalem, Israel's history is described as a repetition of apostasy. This reinforces the fact that God had gone above and beyond in His dealings with His people. Pivotal events in Israel's history are noted, with an assessment of that generation carrying serious implications for Judah during its exile and for us as well. The content of the chapter is organized around the ways God revealed Himself to His people ("I am the LORD," vv. 5, 7, 12, 19, 20, 26, 38, 42, 44).

20:1–17. Exodus and Sinai. During the Exodus (vv. 5–9), God elected Israel and promised them the gift of the land of Canaan. He was their Savior and Warrior (Ex. 15:1–18). Yet Israel rebelled against God and retained their vile and abominable/detestable idols (Ezek. 20:7–8; cf. Ex. 32–34; Deut. 29:16–17), defiling themselves with Egyptian idols (cf. Rom. 1:18–23; PP 315–330). God's restraint was based solely on His sovereign choice of maintaining the holiness of His name/reputation, which would be vindicated before the nations (Ezek. 20:9).

At Sinai (vv. 10–17), God gave them His regulations and His Sabbath (vv. 11–12) as a sign of the covenant, and He revealed Himself as Israel's wise Lawgiver. Sadly, Israel's first generation of the Exodus established a pattern of sin and rebellion in the wilderness (vv. 10–16). The core of the problem was that their hearts were unwilling to appropriate God's grace and holiness. The focus of worship must be the true Creator and Redeemer, whose relationship to Israel and all creation is particularly detailed in the Ten Commandments. The plural form "Sabbaths" does not necessarily include the religious festivals that required the people to go up to Jerusalem to worship God three times a year (Ex. 23:14–19; Deut. 16:1–17). The reference is to the Sabbath as a sign of the covenant. The ceremonial sabbaths served to promote the true worship of God by identifying Him as the source of Israel's temporal wealth and blessings. In the NT, these sabbaths find their deeper meaning through biblical typology in the life, death, and high priestly ministry of Jesus (cf. Acts 2:1–4; 1 Cor. 5:7; Rev. 7:9–12). Because the people desired something other than God's way,

He was justified in disciplining them. But because He is a gracious and loving God, He continually sought to bring them back to covenant faithfulness (Ezek. 20:17).

20:18–44. From the Wilderness to the Monarchy. God gave to the second generation of the Exodus the same opportunity He had given to their fathers, but they also sinned in the wilderness (vv. 18–26). The children did not learn the lessons of their forebearers and repeated the same sins. But this time God informed them that one day they would be scattered among the nations (v. 23; Deut. 28:64). The pattern of rejecting God's way of life had become a way of life for the people (Ezek. 20:24). On the idea that God gave statutes and laws that were "not good" to the Israelites, see below, "God and Bad Laws (Ezekiel 20:25)."

The people rejected the laws of the firstborn (Ex. 13:2, 13; 22:29; 34:20; Num. 18:15) and offered their children in sacrifice to the surrounding pagan idols instead. They disregarded God's law by passing their firstborn through the fire (cf. Ezek. 20:31; Deut. 12:29–31; 2 Kin. 21:6; 23:10; Jer. 7:31; 19:5; 32:35). God passed judgment on their actions and declared them defiled

God and Bad Laws (Ezekiel 20:25)

Ezekiel 20:25 is probably one of the most difficult passages in the book of Ezekiel. Some translations render it as "I gave them statutes that were not good." The commentaries offer different interpretations, but unfortunately none of them has been widely accepted. We will offer a possible way of reading the verse.

1. Stating the Problem. If Ezekiel is stating that God gave the Israelites statutes and laws that "were not good, and judgments by which they could not live," then He would be contradicting Himself. This is the basic problem we face. Nowhere else in the OT is any divine statute or law described as "not good." Rather, what we find is that God told the Israelites that His principles were ones that they should live by (Lev. 18:5; cf. Deut. 4:1). These verses are even quoted in Ezekiel 20:11, 13 and 21—all in the very same context as v. 25, where God refers to giving them what was "not good." On the surface, these statements seem to be in conflict. However, it is important to take into account other considerations, including other aspects of the context, which will help lead to a viable harmonization.

2. Contextual Considerations. As indicated in the commentary, v. 25 belongs to a passage in which the Lord recounted His mighty acts of redemption on behalf of Israel during their departure from Egypt and their sojourns in the wilderness. But the main interest of the text is to reveal the constant spirit of rebellion manifested by God's people in acts of idolatry. It was because of His concern for His honor that God did not abandon them. It is within that review of what He had done for Israel that the Lord said, "I gave to them statutes that were not good." Therefore, He was referring to something He Himself did at a particular moment. However, the context also indicates that the laws God gave to His people were good, and they were expected to live by them. Interestingly, while Ezekiel uses the feminine form khuqot ("statutes") when referring to God's law (vv. 11, 13), in v. 25 the masculine khuqqim (“statutes”) is used. This change may be a signal that in v. 25 Ezekiel is not referring to the same statutes mentioned in vv. 11 and 13. Whatever v. 25 may mean, Ezekiel himself, as well as the rest of the OT, considered God’s laws to be good.

3. Suggested Solution. A possible solution is found in the next verse (v. 26), where a specific law is mentioned. The passage refers to the law of the firstborn. Every firstborn child belonged to the Lord, but since the Lord rejected child sacrifice, the Israelites would redeem their children. Unfortunately, there were times when they chose to sacrifice their children to the pagan deity Molech. This practice is explicitly mentioned in v. 31. This certainly was a bad law, but it was not from the Lord. So, the context informs us what was meant by a law that was “not good.” If that is the case, then we must ask, Why would the Lord say that He gave them statutes that were not good? We should look at the text a little closer.

Most Bible versions render the first verb in v. 25 to read “I gave them.” That is a good translation, but there are other possibilities. For instance, we could also translate it as “I even imposed on them” or “I also gave them over to statutes.” These translations are based on the fact that when the Hebrew verb natan (“to give”) is followed by the preposition le (“to”), it could mean “to deliver someone to.” The translation “I also gave them up to statutes that were not good” could be correct. In that case, the text would be saying that since the Israelites determined to follow bad laws from their neighbors, the Lord confirmed their willing rebellion against Him by handing them over to obedience to laws that were not good. The idea that God confirms disobedience by handing rebellious people over to it is attested in other places in the Bible (e.g., Is. 6:9–10; 63:17; 2 Thess. 2:11–12). According to Ezekiel 20:26, even then the Lord is seeking to impress upon them the magnitude of their sins, hoping to lead them to repentance.

(Ezek. 20:31). This custom of filicide (killing one’s own children) indicates that the Israelites were following the cultic practices of pagan nations (cf. v. 18). Declared defiled, they could not approach the Lord and finally had to be expelled from the land. Thus, God would show that He is God. Verse 27 summarizes the charges against the people as being related to blasphemy and disloyalty. God is blasphemed when His people take up the customs of the world and reject His grace, love, and lordship.

The experience of the people, from the times of the Judges to the monarchy (vv. 27–32), shows that God fulfilled His promise of the land (v. 28). But unfortunately, Israel blasphemed Him by worshiping the gods of the Canaanites.

Each section of the chapter reflects the same pattern: God giving undeserved grace, Israel responding with apostasy, and God withholding judgment for His name’s sake. Though there were bright spots in the history of Israel, Ezekiel’s long view of that history is one of false starts, calamitous outcomes, and continuous rebelliousness (cf. 2:3). God’s remedy was restorative judgment (20:33–44). To remind the exiles that He was the reason for every good thing they experienced, He promised to bring them back to the place where they had experienced His grace and covenant promises.

20:45—22:31

The Drawn Sword and the Impure City

The storyline of this section is structured around fire (cf. the inclusio 20:45–49//21:31–32) and the sword—the riddle of the sword (21:1–7); the sword sharpened and ready (vv. 8–17); the sword in action (vv. 18–27); and the sword sheathed (vv. 28–32). (In modern translations, 20:45–49 corresponds to 21:1–5 in the Hebrew text.) Ezekiel was informed that God would execute judgment on Israel in the same way He judged the nations—through military defeat (cf. chaps. 25–32). His sword, Babylon, would be unsheathed, slicing and dicing, bringing death and destruction, yet even the sword would become an object of God’s judgment (21:30–32; cf. Hab. 1:5–2:20). Because the people complained that Ezekiel was speaking in parables, the metaphor of fire is interpreted as referring to the sword (Ezek. 20:46–49; 21:3). Bad news was coming that would cause hearts to melt, hands to become feeble, spirits to faint, and knees to become weak as water (21:7).

20:45—21:7. The Flame and Sword of Judgment. Now that a historical review of Israel has been given (chap. 20), the consequences are to be meted out (21:1–5). God had made use of a multitude of images that depicted historical circumstances, and He used fire to depict judgment on the inhabitants of Jerusalem (cf. 15:5–8) and stating that Babylon was God's instrument of judgment on His own people (12:13; 17:12, 16, 20; 19:9). The apparent grievance was not due to the content of the message; it stemmed from the spiritual dullness of the people, whose attitude is elsewhere expressed as being in denial (12:21–28). God directed Ezekiel to use his present position in Babylon as his point of reference (20:46). Teman (Southland) is Jerusalem, which is considered to be south of Babylon (vv. 46–47). The land of Israel is depicted as a forest that is fuel for the unquenchable fires of judgment (v. 47; cf. 1 Kin. 5:6). Ezekiel has already described the circumstances of the besiegement of Judah (Ezek. 4–7), and here he writes about the reaction to the report of Babylon's preparation for the invasion (21:6–7). While God can distinguish between the righteous and the wicked in an investigative judgment (cf. chap. 9), an invading pagan army could not make such a distinction (21:3–5). In this regard, the few righteous persons would suffer with the wicked.

21:8–17. The Sword Is Sharpened. In a poetic utterance filled with anguish, the sword is made ready for Yahweh's use in judgment—it was sharpened and polished (v. 9). In His workshop of divine providence, He had prepared Babylon (the Neo-Babylonian Empire) for the world stage. The actions of the nations would be seen within the purview of God's sovereignty and prophetic fulfillment (Is. 44:28; Jer. 25:9). Through the prophet Jeremiah, God told His people to accept the current political regime (i.e., Babylonian rule) and focus on restoring their relationship with Him (Jer. 25:5–6; 29:1–14).

God directed Ezekiel to strike his hands together (Ezek. 21:14) as a symbol of God's use of the sword (v. 17). He would move the sword to the right and left, up and down (v. 16). The Lord would cause slaughter and destruction everywhere upon the people. However, there was a note of hope in this proclamation of judgment. The nations, subject to God, could only go as far as He would allow. God's people were not to be left wholly to the machinations of the wicked; it was God who would brandish the sword (vv. 16–17). The prophet Habakkuk (ca. 640–609 B.C.) saw the decline of the Assyrian juggernaut and the ascendancy of Babylon, and he asked about what many today are concerned with: the justice of God (theodicy).

But Ezekiel is depicting God as the Divine Warrior who restores justice and righteousness to the land (Israel), albeit through warfare.

21:18–32. The Sword in Action. Ezekiel would mark out two ways or roads and place a signpost where the two roads branched out, one to the Ammonite capital of Rabbah and the other to Jerusalem (vv. 19–20). The king of Babylon would stand at the head of the two roads with his sword, using three specific types of divination to choose one of them: (1) the selection of marked arrows; (2) consulting idols; and (3) hepatoscopy—examining the liver of slain animals to make predictions. Not only would God send Babylon to execute judgment upon Judah, but He would allow the Babylonian king to work through his religious practices to determine the way to go that would result in the fulfillment of God's purposes. Behind all of this was God's sovereignty. To the Judahite leaders, whose focus was on ritual rather than on obedience (1 Sam. 15:22–23), it seemed like a false divination, and because it was judged false, they would deny its validity. But the message to Judah was clear: God is sovereign and He works with people where they are. Nebuchadnezzar eventually came to his senses (Dan. 4:34–37), but the Davidic king, who had contact with the God of heaven, access to His revelation and abiding presence, and evidence of His faithfulness and mighty acts on the Israelites' behalf, remained in disbelief and rebellion.

The Ammonites probably assumed that since Babylon attacked Israel, they would be safe, but God assured them that their time was coming (Ezek. 21:28–29). In 25:1–7, God laid out further details in regard to Ammon's destined doom. Like Assyria (Is. 10:5–19), Babylon was used by God to bring judgment but would also receive judgment. God's engagement with Israel's neighbors in the wider landscape of history shows how, with Israel's compliance or defiance, the nations would have a witness to the Sovereign of the world.

22:1–31. The Impure City. Israel's concept of holiness included their God (Lev. 19:1–8), their bodies (Lev. 11:1–14:32; 18), their social interactions (Lev. 19:9–18; 25:35–55), their homes (Lev. 14:33–57), their land and property (Lev. 25:1–34), and their worship (Lev. 17:1–8; 23). Every area of life was set apart as belonging to God. Ezekiel now describes the reason for the judgment announced in the previous chapter. Israel had defiled herself in every area of life: religiously, politically, socially, and economically. God enumerated Judah's sins (Ezek. 22:1–16), stated His response of punishment (vv. 17–22), and identified the main culprits (vv. 23–31).

The catalog of Israel's offenses includes breaches of covenant provisions found mainly in Leviticus 18–20. God's focus was the city, a metaphor (i.e., metonymy) for those who constituted the city. The nations would mock Israel (Ezek. 22:4–5). The breakdown of the social relationships among God's people can be attributed to an unbiblical view of the image of God (Gen. 1:26). The shedding of blood (Ezek. 22:3) refers to the literal taking of life, demanding the life of the one who took it as recompense because people are made in God's image (Gen. 9:6; Num. 35:33). But the shedding of blood created another problem. It had defiled the land and had made it incompatible with holiness. Ezekiel's point is that left unresolved, such a defilement would lead to exile (Lev. 18:28). The murderers deserved just retribution. Other problems are identified: idolatry (Ezek. 22:3; cf. Ex. 20:2–7), dishonoring parents (Ezek. 22:7; cf. Ex. 20:12; Lev. 19:3), not caring for the disadvantaged classes of society (Ezek. 22:7; cf. Lev. 19:3, 10), Sabbath breaking (Ezek. 22:8; cf. Ex. 20:8–11), slander (Ezek. 22:9; cf. Ex. 20:16), pagan worship (Ezek. 22:9; cf. Lev. 18:17), sexual deviancy (Ezek. 22:10–11; cf. Lev. 18:7–20; Ex. 20:14), and financial bribery and extortion (Ezek. 22:12; cf. Deut. 16:19; 27:25). All these, in one way or another, defamed God's intention to restore His image in humans. But God would bring all of this to an end (Ezek. 22:13–16).

The God of Ezekiel and the God of Gideon are the same (cf. Judg. 7). God wanted the pure metal of faith; the dross of unbelief, doubt, and rebellion needed to be removed (Ezek. 22:18). Quality is desired over quantity. While God's desire is for everyone to be saved (1 Tim. 2:4), His rhetorical question (Ezek. 22:14) indicates that many would not be willing to have the gold of a faith that could endure to the end (Luke 18:8). Judah had become impatient with God's call for endurance and trust (Jer. 28:1–4; 29:24–28). The future "gathering" prophecies typically signify hope, restoration, and renewal (Is. 11:12; 40:9–11; 54:7; Jer. 23:3; 29:14). Unfortunately, here the people would be gathered for judgment (Ezek. 22:19). The imagery is of leftover dross, the waste material left after metals are purified by the process of smelting (vv. 17–22).

Though leaders and people alike were guilty of rebellion (cf. Hos. 4:9), the emphasis in Ezekiel is predominantly placed on the leaders who were primarily responsible for defiling the city. They were chosen as God's agents of grace who would (1) proclaim His word faithfully (prophets; Ezek. 22:25); (2) help the people distinguish the holy from the profane, mediate God's reconciliation, and lead out in true worship (priests; v. 26; Lev. 10:10); and (3) exemplify God's sovereignty before the nation through justice (princes or officials; Ezek. 22:27; Deut. 1:9–18). They turned upside down every means and method God established to guide the people in holy living: the Torah, the holy places, the purity laws, justice, etc. The leaders used their position to enrich themselves through lies, manipulation, bribes, extortion, and all forms of injustice. Among God's people, leadership is meant to protect and provide for an environment where God's grace can be made manifest and His character can be revealed.

23:1–49

Oholah and Oholibah

The evident parallels with chapter 16 display once again God's love for His people and their constant refusal to live in harmony with Him. Through the imagery of two sisters, the acts of the capital cities of Samaria (23:5–10) and Jerusalem (vv. 11–35) are described. God's judgment on the two kingdoms is reviewed in graphic detail as He again encouraged Ezekiel to get through to His people in His final word (vv. 36–49). The theme of harlotry ties together the various sections of the parable. Israel's adulterous acts describe a moral pathology, where they courted political alliances, copied foreign cultic rituals, and denied their Lord, who provided for them.

23:1–4. Two Sisters and Their Harlotry. Israel's mission would be a light to the nations as a royal priesthood and a holy nation (Ex. 19:6). Solomon's son Rehoboam foolishly misused his position of trust as a badge of autonomous rule and brought an impassable division to an already tense relationship between the Judahites and the northern Israelites (2 Sam 2–5; 1 Kin. 12). The two sisters, Oholah ("her tent") and Oholibah ("my tent is in her")—Israel and Judah—came from one mother: a common patriarchal origin and exodus experience (Ezek. 23:2; cf. Ex. 19:1–5). In the description of the sisters as the capital cities of each kingdom (Samaria and Jerusalem; Ezek. 23:4), a political context is in view. The picture of a fractured people of God (the Northern and Southern Kingdoms) is addressed by God's gracious promise of the renewing work of His Spirit (chap. 37). Before that work of grace could occur, it was necessary to address their sin. Israel's idolatrous relationship began early in Egypt and carried on throughout their political existence (23:3; cf. 16:23–26; 20:5–8; Ex. 16:1–3; 32; Is. 30–31). Samaria was ultimately forsaken by Egypt, who never had their best interests at heart like their Lord Yahweh did (2 Kin. 17:4).

23:5–10. Samaria and Her Lovers. Samaria's harlotry with Assyria is seen best in its dependence on Assyria to the point of becoming a vassal who paid tribute. The northern kings Menahem (2 Kin. 15:19) and Hoshea (2 Kin. 17:3) operated by sight and not by faith, and they assumed that placating the major world power at the time was the best way to retain their own hold on power (Hos. 5:13; 7:11; 8:9). The political influence on Israel's religious actions stemmed back to the Northern Kingdom's first king, Jeroboam, who was the prototype of covenant failure in kingship (2 Kin. 10:29; 17:21). It is interesting that he tried to connect Israel's worship to Egypt with his idolatrous acts (1 Kin. 11:40; 12:28). The Northern Kingdom's relationship with foreign nations was constantly a subject of criticism by the prophets sent to them (Hos. 8:9; Amos 1–2).

23:11–35. Judah and Her Lovers. While it is hoped that people learn from the mistakes of others, Jerusalem never took any lessons from the destruction of Samaria. In fact, Jerusalem's duplicity seems to have gone far beyond Samaria's (Ezek. 16:47–52). More attention is paid to Judah (Oholibah) for two reasons: (1) she was the only kingdom left when Ezekiel wrote, and was so for over a century; and (2) Judah was the only and last bastion of hope for God's purposes to be carried out through the Davidic dynasty. Isaiah's proclamations of the coming of the Branch from Jesse seemed a distant dream (cf. Is. 11:1). Judah's vacillations between Egypt, Assyria, and Babylon exemplified the existing confusion among the leaders. Even one of Judah's best kings, Hezekiah, was carried along with a folly typical of the northern kings. While still subject to Assyria, Hezekiah accommodated envoys from Babylon, which drew the dismay and rebuke of Isaiah (Ezek. 23:12–18; 2 Kin. 18:14–16; 20:12–13; Is. 39). Though the people of God had been liberated from Egyptian bondage, Egypt continued to be a major influence on the political scene for Judah. Even after the only king prophesied about by name (Josiah) fell to the Egyptians (2 Kin. 23:28–30), even after Jehoahaz was taken captive to Egypt (2 Kin. 23:31–34), even after having a puppet king placed on the throne and being stripped financially (2 Kin. 23:34–35), Judah still lusted after Egypt for aid (Ezek. 23:19–21). In four oracles of judgment, God explained how Judah would be dismantled: the betrayal of their lovers (vv. 22–27), the economic devastation of agricultural life (vv. 28–31), the international disdain and exile (vv. 32–34), and the necessity for divine retribution to be rendered for their idolatrous ways (v. 35).

23:36–49. This They Have Done to Me. The presence of God departed from the sanctuary in Jerusalem because it had been polluted with Judah's abominations. Child sacrifice is mentioned several times (16:20; 23:37, 39), and it is crucial to ascertain why this was such an abomination, even beyond the murdering of their own children, which was horrifying enough. The law required that every firstborn be given to Yahweh—set apart for Him as a memorial of His redemption in bringing the people out of Egypt. Every male firstborn had to be redeemed by an animal (Ex. 13:12–16; 34:19–20). Unlike Israel, some of the surrounding pagan nations sacrificed their children to their idols (2 Kin. 3:27). It is likely, as the Moabite Stone intimates, that King Mesha used this practice to appease his national god Chemosh, who was angry with his land. The practice is also associated with Molech (Lev. 18:21; 20:2–5). The Judahites may have at times engaged in this practice in an attempt to avert the judgment of God. They may have brought this pagan practice into God's sanctuary, thus making it even more atrocious (Ezek. 23:39) as they rejected God's call to repentance and worsened their situation instead of averting disaster. Furthermore, by duplicating the practices of the nations, Judah may have been seeking to curry acceptance from the surrounding nations, thereby abandoning their distinctive role as a covenant people through whom the nations could seek Yahweh. Sadly, their sons would be killed anyway, this time not to avert a crisis but as part of the crisis (vv. 46–49).

24:1–27

SIEGE OF JERUSALEM

As a pivotal turning point in the book, Ezekiel 24 in a way foreshadows Jerusalem's ultimate destruction because of Judah's constant fracturing of their relationship with God. Yet God's ultimate purpose remained for a redeemed and purified people. While the besiegement of Judah meant the beginning of the end of the Davidic dynasty, it also marked the fulfillment of the Torah's warnings and the fulfillment of the prophecies of a series of preexilic prophets. The effect of suffering included an encouragement to go back to God's word and to ask what went wrong. In the aftermath of the siege, the postexilic prophets conveyed a deeper sense of, and hope in, God's sovereignty as they saw His promises of return and restoration come to fruition.

The siege of Jerusalem would establish trust in what the Lord, Yahweh, had said, which had permeated Ezekiel's proclamations up to that point. Ezekiel's contemporary, Daniel, proclaims an apocalyptic view of history while standing on the shoulders of Ezekiel's eschatological language and focusing on the sanctuary of God, atonement (Ezek. 8-11; 40-48; Dan. 8:14; 9:24-27), the judgment of the nations, and the vindication of the faithful people of God (Ezek. 25-32; 34-37; Dan. 2, 7-8, 10-12). Because of Israel's misplaced trust in a physical structure (Jer. 7:1-4), the destruction of the first temple in a sense paved the way for a temple of greater significance (Matt. 12:6; John 2:19). In Ezekiel's book, the last message before the beginning of the siege divides into two sections: the parable of the boiling pot (Ezek. 24:1-14) and the sign-act of a sudden death (vv. 15-27).

24:1-14

The Boiling Pot and the Siege of Jerusalem

The parable of the boiling pot is told in a poem (vv. 3-5) and is followed by its explanation (vv. 6-14). God commanded Ezekiel to write down the date when the king of Babylon began his siege against Jerusalem (i.e., January 15, 588 B.C.; vv. 1-2). The divine request to date prophetic events was not simply done to satisfy human curiosity but was an announcement of divine foreknowledge and providential sovereignty. It was implicitly a call to submit to the all-powerful and all-knowing majesty of the Creator and Redeemer. Scripture proclaims God as telling the what (event) and the when (time), but also as being intimately involved in the how (process) (cf. Dan. 9:20-23; 10:18-21).

The boiling pot (Ezek. 24:6; Jerusalem) in chapter 11 and the corrosive elements mentioned in 22:18-22 are now combined in a proverb of epic proportions. What was thought of as a metaphor of protection by the princes (11:3, 6-7) here (chap. 24) is turned on its head by God becoming a purifying cauldron of judgment. In satirical fashion, the cook would put all the good and choice pieces into the pot (cf. 23:7). This is a reference to the political and social elite. Combined with sacrificial language, the unusual use of a copper cauldron (24:11) suggests both a court banquet and a cultic meal. God's interpretation of the parable is twofold. First, Judah's defilement included a disdain for the sanctity of life (vv. 6-8). Their acts of bloodshed (v. 7) are here described as a failure to observe the obligation that respects life, for which the penalty was to be "cut off" and to "bear his iniquity" (Lev. 17:10-16). Second, God is described as the master cook, whose work would bring the needed cleanness (Ezek. 24:9-14). Judah's attempts to purify itself were short-lived and ultimately failed to work the type of purity God called for (e.g., Hezekiah's reforms, 2 Kin. 18; Josiah's reforms, 2 Kin. 22-23).

24:15-27

Ezekiel's Wife a Sign

God informed the prophet Ezekiel that he was going to take away from him the desire or delight of his eyes, but He would not allow any type of visible grief on the prophet's part. There would be no ceremonial mourning rites (v. 17; cf. Lev. 13:45; Mic. 3:7). So Ezekiel's wife died, and noting Ezekiel's past unorthodox actions, the people realized that his response carried some prophetic import. Just as Ezekiel experienced suddenly the death of his wife, so would the sanctuary of God be destroyed suddenly. Just as Ezekiel would not mourn for the loss of his wife, even so the children of Israel were not to be permitted to mourn for the profanation of God's dwelling place or the loss of their spouses and children who would perish during the siege (Ezek. 24:15-24). This was not a typical situation that would elicit the typical responses to death. During the long trek to Babylon from Jerusalem, the survivors would confirm the veracity of the prophetic message.

25:1-32:32

ORACLES AGAINST THE NATIONS

The oracles against Judah's surrounding neighbors start in the upper Transjordan area in the northeast and move southward and then westward toward the coastal regions: northeast (Ammon), east (Moab), southeast (Edom), and southwest (Philistia). All nations addressed in chapter 25 denote small, local nation-states whose power and influence was typically exerted within their geographical boundaries and who in some way took advantage of Judah's misfortune. Sporadically they formed alliances and fought against God's people (2 Sam. 8; 2 Kin. 24:2). Ezekiel proclaims a series of three oracles in chapters 26–28 against Phoenicia (Tyre and Sidon, powerful city-states), Israel's neighbor situated in the northwest. He rounds out his oracles in chapters 29–32 against Egypt. The oracles against Tyre/Sidon and Egypt follow a similar pattern of prophecy (chaps. 26, 29) and lament (chaps. 27, 30), followed by another prophecy (chaps. 28, 31). The oracles against the nations have a common format that shares a varied form of four or five elements between them (here there are four):

- Messenger formula—God's declaration
- Indictment of the wrong committed
- Verdict of God's judgment
- Purpose of revealing God

It is unknown whether these oracles were actually sent to the nations they critique. For Judah, the literary placement of these oracles between the commencement of the siege (chap. 24) and its completion (chap. 33) served several instructive purposes. First, these prophecies pointed to God's sovereignty over the nations. Created in the image of God, all humans share ethical norms and are accountable to Him. The law codes of Israel's neighbors indicate that in many cases they had judicial, social, and cultural mores similar to those of Israel. So the lawsuits against the nations are based on a basic code of ethics (cf. Amos 1–2). Second, the prophecies also served as a warning to Judah: (1) not to trust in the human devices of military strength or political acumen because they too receive the judgment of God, and (2) that though Judah was His elect people, God is no respecter of persons; if Judah was acting like the surrounding nations, it would experience the same judgment. According to Jeremiah 27, with the exception of Egypt, which is mentioned later in the book, these nations would be given over to Babylonian control by God's decree.

25:1–17

Ammon, Moab, Seir, Edom, and Philistia

Typically grouped together in the prophets, the first several nations mentioned can be seen as extended familial states that engaged in unending conflicts with Israel (Ps. 60:8; Jer. 9:25–26). First, Ammon (Ezek. 25:2–7) was born to Lot, Abraham's nephew, through an incestuous encounter (Gen. 19:30–38). His ancestor's historical interaction with Abraham's descendants was marked with squabbles over land and economic interests (Judg. 10–11; 1 Sam. 11; 2 Sam. 10; Jer. 49:1–6). Ammon's pagan influence and attitude toward God's sanctuary, land, and kingship (Ezek. 25:3) were part of the reason for Josiah's efforts to remove the holy places dedicated to Ammonite idols (2 Kin. 23:13). In Ezekiel 21:19–20 a signpost marked Nebuchadnezzar's decision to move his invading army first against Judah. Ezekiel 25:1–7 expands on 21:28–29, alerting Ammon not to gloat over its assumed escape because judgment was on its way. True to his warning, God turned the capital city and center of Ammon's economic activity (Rabbah) into a pastureland; it was largely depopulated, with many of its people displaced. Nebuchadnezzar's punitive campaign, around 582 B.C., stopped Ammon from functioning as an independent polity.

The ancestors of Ammon's brother Moab (Ezek. 25:8–11) had a history of conflicts with Israel (Judg. 3:12–20; 2 Kin. 3), but also a history connected with Israel's kingship (Ruth 4:13–18; Matt. 1:5). Solomon's introduction of Moabite religion into Israel near Jerusalem (1 Kin. 11:7, 33; 2 Kin. 23:13) established a pattern of syncretism in the political activity of the kings of Judah and Israel, leading Moab and others to assume Israel was just another small nation-state (Ezek. 25:8, cf. Is. 37:8–13). However, God would show the Moabites that despite Judah's failures, their God was Lord of all (cf. Is. 15:1). Through a series of providential events, Moab would be open to invasion. All three cities, Beth Jeshimoth, Baal Meon, and Kiri[j]athaim were along Moab's western line of defense. Like Israel, Moab would be the recipient of the execution of divine judgment (Ezek. 5:15; 11:9; 16:41).

The perpetual enemy of Israel, Edom (25:12–14; Is. 34) consisted of the descendants of Jacob's brother, Esau (Gen. 25:19–30). Edom's duplicity was exposed as it initially joined the conspiracy against Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. 27:3) but then took advantage of Judah's weakened state as a result of the Babylonian invasions. In poetic justice, the vengeance that Edom took against Judah would be met with divine vengeance through Israel at some future time (Ezek. 25:14). This promise provided Israel with the hope of a restored kingdom as God's elect (God referring to them as “My people”). God declared that Edom would know His vengeance (v. 14), with a biblical principle of retribution at work (cf. Obad. 15). Since the language used in the message against the Philistines is similar to that of Edom, the inclusion of the Philistines stems from its similar interaction with Judah.

26:1–21

Tyre and the Judgment of God

The oracles against Tyre (“rock,” cf. v. 4) are divided into four sections introduced by the messenger formula: the announcement of Tyre’s destruction (vv. 1–6), the agent of Tyre’s destruction (vv. 7–14), the impact of Tyre’s destruction (vv. 15–18), and the aftermath of Tyre’s destruction (vv. 19–21). As a major commercial merchant and occasional ally to Israel, Tyre’s lucrative exchanges with Israel (2 Sam. 5:11–12; 1 Kin. 5:1; 9:26–28; 10:11–12) showed signs of deterioration as Egyptian, Assyrian, and Babylonian hegemony shifted throughout the ancient Near East. The anticipation of a fortuitous plundering of Israel—the gateway to the nations/peoples (Ezek. 26:2)—during the besiegement (v. 1) indicates how Tyre traded in on power politics through subterfuge that would ultimately lead to an astonishing lament (vv. 15–18). Foreshadowing later descriptions, Tyre’s duplicity, indifference, and deception based on its commercial affluence portrays a historical archetype and a foreshadowing of subsequent theological use (see chap. 28).

The proclamation of judgment and its fulfillment bring to light the different emphases of the two types of prophecy. Though it uses eschatological language when it comes to the judgment of the nations, classical prophecy, unlike the apocalyptic prophecies of Daniel and Revelation, is typically focused within the immediate time-frame and circumstances of the prophet, or soon thereafter. Tyre’s destruction is described as the result of the attacks of many nations (26:3, 5). However, only Nebuchadnezzar is mentioned by name (v. 7). His siege from 585 to 572 B.C. cut the major supply lines to the island and devastated Tyre’s mainland satellite cities (vv. 6, 8), but not the island proper (29:17–20). Historians affirm that it was Alexander the Great in 332 B.C. who penetrated Tyre’s defenses on the island and finally incapacitated it. While giving a nod to its eventual captors (26:4–5, 12–13), the focus of the prophecy is on the judgment of this commercial juggernaut and Babylon as God’s agent in judgment. Elements from its final destruction are mixed with historical elements from Nebuchadnezzar’s siege.

Two important points of interpretation for classical prophecy are: (1) the literary placement and the theological description of events, and (2) the historical fulfillment within the context of God’s merciful warnings, His providential acts, and a nation’s response (cf. Jer. 18:1–11; Jon. 1–4). By devoting three chapters to the description of Tyre’s judgment, Ezekiel sets the literary scene for the judgment of the anointed cherub in 28:10–19. Historically, when Judah was besieged and finally fell, only Tyre and Egypt still offered resistance to Babylon. Thus, it is understandable that the larger focus is on these nations in comparison with the others in chapter 25.

27:1–36

Tyre: A City Shipwrecked

Continuing the lament (Heb. qinah, term for a dirge sung at the death of a person or city; cf. 19:1) from 26:17–21, Ezekiel increases the metaphorical weight of Tyre’s self-confidence, affluence, and excess that provides the language and themes upon which the anointed cherub will be paralleled in the next chapter. In a catalog of nations (27:12–24) couched between two laments (vv. 4–11, 25–36), the key Hebrew verb rakal (“to trade” or “to gossip” in its participial form; translated as “the trading ones” or “merchants” in vv. 3, 13, 15, 17, 20, 22, 23, 24)—provides the context for the litany of Tyre’s international reach in commerce. Some of the nations mentioned (Greece [Javan], Tubal, Meshech [Meshek], Togarmah, Dedan, Uzal, Canneh [Kanneh], Sheba, Asshur [Ashur], vv. 12–27) appear in the Table of Nations in Genesis 10. The use of Tyre’s king as an archetype is thus based on its international reach, its commercial trade among the powerful, and its connection back to a time of worldwide diffusion of nations.

The lament satirizes Tyre metaphorically as a ship (Ezek. 27:4). This is an apt metaphor for a maritime power with two major sea ports that served as a trader for the Mediterranean world and transported commodities throughout the ancient Near East. By underscoring the highest-quality materials (vv. 5–7) and the skilled crew (vv. 8–11), Tyre’s commercial ability, efficiency in trade, and prominence among its peers is revealed. The impressive networking among the nations (v. 10; Persia, Lydia, and Put [or Libya]; i.e., Iran, Turkey, and Egypt) signifies the farthest parts of the known world that were within its reach. The scope of its business, ranging from the domestic (food, animals, and slaves) to the royal (precious stones, war implements, elegant palace wares) left no aspect of life untouched (vv. 12–25). In poetic style, its massive shipwreck (v. 26) is described in the most catastrophic terms. All that made its value formidable was destroyed not by war, intrigue, or a loss in vitality or skill but by the providential hand of God in the “east wind.” The east wind represents a sign of judgment, and in scriptural accounts God is typically the agent who brings it (Gen. 41:6; Ex. 10:13; Ps. 48:7; Is. 27:8; Jer. 18:17). Tyre’s demise would cause confusion as well as dismay (Ezek. 27:28–32). Tyre is said to have provided the accoutrements and allurements of wealth and ease, but they would be like scattered pieces of wood on the sea. What made Tyre great was what ultimately led to its demise. One more vivid picture is relayed before the central issue of the book is reached: the cosmic conflict—its actors, its plotline, and its finale.

28:1–10

Tyre and the Prince

The indictment and judgment of the human ruler (Ithbaal), the prince or ruler (Heb. nagid; 1 Sam. 9:16) of Tyre, is summarized here, harkening back to Adam and Eve’s fall—the attempt to be God (Ezek. 28:2; Gen. 3:6). The main issue of their sin was their attempt to claim divinity and independence from God. Eve took upon herself the prerogatives of God’s sovereignty (cf. Gen. 1:10, 12, 18, 21, 25, 31: “and God saw that it was good”; and Gen. 3:6: “and the woman saw that the fruit [that God had forbidden] was good”). This resulted in Eve making judgments in the place of divine providence: seeing the food as (1) “good” to eat, (2) pleasing to her eyes, and (3) something desirable for wisdom (Gen. 3:6). The Lord God had already made provision for these in His gift of what He deemed good (Gen. 2:9). God intended life, but humans desired autonomy, which usually leads to unintended negative consequences (Prov. 14:12). The prince of Tyre took up the same quest and met with the same reminder of human limits (Ezek. 28:2; cf. Gen. 3:17–19). His acquisition of wealth was not in accordance with God’s desire (Ezek. 28:4; Prov. 16:16; Zech. 9:2–4). Instead of seeking to reflect the image of God in obedience, mercy, love, and justice (Deut. 10:12–13), his accrual of wealth was intended to reflect his aspirations for divinity (Ezek. 28:6).

God promised to bring Babylon against Tyre (v. 7; see also 26:7; 30:10, 11; 31:12).

28:11–19

Tyre and the Judgment on the Fallen Cherub

Ezekiel shifts the focus to the king of Tyre. This subtle shift from “prince/ruler” (Heb. nagid) to “king” (Heb. melek; vv. 2, 12) perhaps suggests someone more prominent being in view beyond the earthly ruler who was just addressed. Although one can detect some linguistic parallels with the narrative of Adam and Eve, the background of the passage is more sinister. In describing the activities of the King of Tyre, the language and experience of the fall of a heavenly cherub is used in Ezekiel’s account and consequently provides important information related to the origin of evil. The king/cherub is described in three ways. (1) He was the seal (Heb. khotem from the verb khatam could also mean “the one who seals”) of perfection. This king is compared to a perfectly designed seal, probably in order to indicate that he possessed influence and authority (see Is. 14:12; cf. Ps. 104:2). Also, (2) he was full of wisdom and (3) perfect in beauty, a description that suggests he had inner and external beauty (Ezek. 28:4, 5, 7). This being, who had a symmetry of character (“perfect” or “blameless,” v. 15; cf. Gen. 6:9) and appearance, was in close proximity to God and was consequently respected by others. His beauty, wisdom, capabilities, and previous access to the heavenly abode would have made him a formidable foe. Ezekiel’s description was a warning not to underestimate him (see 2 Cor. 11:14; 1 Pet. 5:8).

The precious stones in the list (Ezek. 28:13) are similar to the precious stones on the priestly vestment (Ex. 28:17–20) but not exactly the same. The primary function of the precious stones is probably to identify the person as a royal figure. The Hebrew text could be read as indicating that the cherub was wearing the stones or that the stones were part of the fence of the Garden of God. Contextually, it may be better to see them as part of the dress of the cherub. This anointed cherub (Ezek. 28:14), like the cherubim mentioned earlier in 1:4–14 and 10:1–22, was a throne guardian with a doxological function. The meaning of the Hebrew words top and negeb (v. 13) in the context of this passage is not clear. If the reference is to musical instruments (“tambourine” [Ex. 15:20; Ps. 149:3] and “pipe” or “flute”), the implication would be that the cherub was also a musician. Other options are to see these terms as referring to “settings” and “mountings” or “sockets” for precious jewels, or “pendants” and “engravings” themselves. Moreover, the presence of this cherub in the heavenly holy mountain of God suggests a cosmic focus (Ezek. 28:14). All told, the connection of royal and religious prerogatives with his anointed status indicates that this cherub had an exalted position over the other cherubim in heaven. In the earthly sanctuary, there were two covering or guarding cherubs (Ex. 25:18–22), so this angel (Ezek. 28:14) dwelt in the very presence of God.

The moral descent of this heavenly being to wickedness is incomprehensible. One thing is clear, namely, that he was a creature (vv. 13, 15). Evil originated not in God but in a creature. Moses states that the serpent, whom NT writers later identified as Satan (Gen. 3:1; Rom. 16:20; 2 Cor. 11:14; Rev. 12:9; 20:2), was created, yet by sophistry and subtlety it deceived Eve. Like Tyre, this powerful angel was successful in trafficking (Ezek. 27:3; 28:5, 16, 18), albeit in iniquitous acts that generated violence (28:16; Heb. khamas, “malicious intent”; cf. Ex. 23:1) and sin. The notion of trafficking pictures a trader in wares going back and forth, plying his trade with skillful artistry to enrich himself in some way (see below, “Evil and the Fallen Cherub”). In comparison with the prince who gained wealth, the anointed cherub applied his wisdom to traffic in a pursuit of praise and worship on account of his splendor and beauty (v. 17). Yet like Israel, he corrupted himself on account of pride (cf. 16:47; 20:44; 23:11). Just as Israel’s iniquity profaned (24:21) God’s sanctuary, so the cherub corrupted his sanctuaries (v. 18; some manuscripts have the singular “sanctuary”), which presumably could refer to himself as the object of God’s holiness or perhaps to his profanation of God’s dwelling (v. 18). This was redressed by his expulsion from it. Like Tyre, all would be appalled that one so blessed of God could rebel and come to such an inglorious end (v. 19; see also 27:36).

The nature of Satan’s sin can be better apprehended through the many linguistic parallels that the text has with the Flood narrative (Gen. 6). This narrative has been understood as a reversal of creation. Humanity corrupted itself in rebellion against God, so did Satan (Gen 6:11). The earth was filled with violence, so was Satan (Gen. 6:11). Noah was blameless and walked with God, at one point so did Satan (Gen. 6:9). Just as the implications of the Flood were universal, so also are the implications for the destruction of this anointed cherub.

Evil and the Fallen Cherub

It would be useful for a clearer comprehension of the topic to summarize the origin of evil in a fallen cherub as depicted in Ezekiel 28 and Isaiah 14. In both passages the activities of two earthly kings (Tyre and Babylon) are described using the experience of the fall of a majestic cherub. It is here that we find the origin of the cosmic conflict.

1. A Heavenly Creature. The cherub was not a self-existing being but a creature (Ezek. 28:15). This is important when we discuss the nature of evil itself. It first indicates that sin and evil are not eternal, parallel phenomena, coexisting with God as the source of what is good. Second, it shows that evil did not originate in God but in one of His creatures. God is not responsible for sin because free creatures are responsible for their own actions. Finally, the fact that the cherub was a created being speaks about its finitude. Its existence can and will come to an end (Rev. 21:1–4).

2. A Covering Cherub. The idea of covering cherubim is found in the setting of the sanctuary with the making of the two golden cherubim placed on each end of the cover of the ark of the covenant and looking down toward the place where the glory of God was manifested (Ex. 25:20; 37:9). They represented the heavenly beings who were worshipping God in the heavenly temple. The living cherub of Ezekiel was the one located in closest proximity to God. Therefore, he must have been influential among the angels. This position of honor had been assigned to him by God. The language of Ezekiel 28:14 could be translated as “I ordained/appointed you.” He seems to have been exercising an important leadership position.

3. A Blameless Cherub. God describes this cherub as being perfect in his ways since the day he was created (Ezek. 28:15). This is about both his inner being and his outward appearance. When God created him, there was nothing wrong with him. The Hebrew noun tamim (“perfect”) refers to someone who is as complete as God intended him or her to be. Through his actions, the cherub contributed to the preservation of order within the cosmos. This is something that God himself does because “His way is perfect” (2 Sam. 22:31). When applied to humans, tamim designates a person who walks according to the law of God (Ps. 119:1) and who consequently has access to God’s dwelling (Ps. 15:2). This is the person who does what is right. The least we can say about the perfection of the cherub is that he lived in submission to God’s will for him and the rest of His creation. In other words, there was once a perfect harmony between him and God.

4. Wickedness in the Cherub. The origin of evil is and will remain a mystery because it lacks a reason for its appearance. The cherub was “perfect” in his ways until sin was found in him (Ezek. 28:15). The biblical text makes clear that God created a blameless cherub, but God does not assume responsibility for his wickedness—an unexpected phenomenon was found in him. This was not the way God created him. The verb matsa’ (“to be found”) is often used in legal contexts to indicate that what was found was the result of a judicial process (e.g., Esth. 2:23; Ps. 17:3). It is implied here that the strange behavior of the cherub was legally examined—he went through a judicial process—and it was determined that his behavior did not correspond to what was expected from him but that he was disrupting the harmony of heaven. The judicial process established that there was wickedness in him. Evil became his natural disposition.

5. A Proud Heart. Something strange happened in the inner being of the cherub—something that was related to pride. This is the desire to be high and exalted, to see oneself as better and superior to others. He tried to justify this experience in view of his beauty and splendor (Ezek. 28:17). Because of his pride, the wisdom of the cherub was corrupted or permanently ruined. But behind all of this was a deeper yearning in the heart of the cherub: he wanted to be like God (Is. 14:13). This is what is meant when the text says that the cherub desired to be exalted. The conflict was between the cherub and God. His person was recentralized and at its center was placed hubris—his own ego. He was claiming total independence (i.e., self-sufficiency) from God. He was able to persuade a number of angels and finally Adam and Eve to join his rebellion (Gen. 3:1–8).

6. Trade and Violence. Ezekiel describes the cherub as involved in trade (rekullah) that filled him with violence and resulted in sin (Ezek. 28:16). He was a merchant who, in the context of the passage, was trading a spirit of rebellion. This suggests that other heavenly beings were listening to him. The root meaning of the term rekullah (related to the verb rakil, “to slander”) designates a person who walks about like a merchant seeking to sell merchandise. The cherub was distributing what he considered to be his goods, but what he was really doing was slandering God, and the result was violence in heaven. This violence probably expressed itself in false accusations, influencing others to do likewise, and even self-aggrandizement. The cherub was upsetting God’s established order and damaging the quality of life for himself and others. The conflict was now in the open, and there was war in heaven (Rev. 12:7)—a war that continued on earth after the fall of Adam and Eve and that would be resolved through the cross of Christ. (For a significant discussion of the origin of sin in the writings of Ellen White, see 1SP, 17–24; PP 33–43, and GC 492–504.)

28:20–26

Oracles against the Nations (Sidon)

The oracle against Sidon almost seems like an addendum, yet it reinforces the conviction that the cosmic judgment of the anointed cherub is the paradigm for understanding the local judgment against the wicked. It also buttresses God’s sovereignty over the universe and gave Israel the hope that their King to defeat their enemies, sin, and the nations. While the format follows that of the briefer oracles against the nations in 25:1–17, Sidon’s judgment is mainly framed as a reversal of Israel’s fortunes (cf. 5:17). God’s glory and holiness would be displayed as Sidon became a pawn in the fight of the major powers of the ancient Near East and could no longer obstruct Israel's growth (28:22–24, cf. 1 Kin. 16:29–22:40). The future “gathering” prophecies reflect not only a return to the land but a return to holiness and God's covenant relationship with Israel (Ezek. 28:25–26; cf. 11:16–17; 20:34; 34:12; Deut. 6:10–11).

29:1—32:32

The Fall of Egypt

The seventh nation, Egypt, received pronouncements of doom in a sequence of seven oracles, mainly dated to around the time of the fall of Judah (29:1, 17; 30:1, 20; 31:1; 32:1, 17). Chapters 29–32 prophesy Egypt's destruction in relation to God, Babylon, and Assyria. First, 29:1–16 describes Egypt's fall because of its hubris toward God. Second, vv. 17–20 and 30:20–26 describe Egypt's fall to Babylon with a lament (vv. 1–19). Third, 31:1–18 compares Egypt's fall to Assyria's fall and is followed by another lament (chap. 32).

29:1–21. The Great Dragon Pharaoh. Escaping Assyrian control only to face a new menace in the Babylonian Empire during the Saite Period (Twenty-Sixth Dynasty), Egypt continued to pose a formidable counterpart to the major powers east of Israel. Shortly after the ascension of the Egyptian Pharaoh Hophra (Apries, 589–570 B.C.), Ezekiel was given two oracles concerning the arrogance and pride of Egypt that mark a year into the siege of Judah (vv. 1–16; ca. 587 B.C.) and probably the end of his ministry (vv. 17–21; ca. 571 B.C.). The tannin (variously translated as “crocodile,” “dragon,” or “monster”) reflects Egypt's crocodile cults that were associated with the divine ruler. For Israel, it was the embodiment of a mysterious evil (Is. 51:9–10). God showed His sovereignty over all of creation and predicted that Pharaoh Hophra would be destroyed by the “sword” (i.e., by military might; Ezek. 29:8; cf. Jer. 37:7; 44:30); this destruction is also described as a hunt (Ezek. 29:4–5).

The conventional language of forty years (i.e., a generation) reminded Judah of Israel's wilderness wanderings (v. 11; Deut. 1:6–3:29) and the time of judgment described earlier (Ezek. 4:6). Judgment for Egypt meant that there was no second option for Judah. Initially, before the siege, King Zedekiah ill-advisedly requested help from Egypt (17:11–21), and subsequently God's word came to pass and Pharaoh Hophra, in a twist of irony, had to flee Egypt when a rebellion broke out against him. He was later defeated by Amasis, his own general. After Nebuchadnezzar despoiled Egypt's wealth, the subsequent domination of Egypt by the Persians and the Greeks affirmed God's omniscient promise (29:15). The first oracle closes on a note of hope in a restored horn (v. 21), a token of power whose symbolism likely points to the restoration of a faithful Davidic kingship through the Messiah, which is developed further along in chapter 34 (cf. Ps. 132:17). Those who lived through the Exile and its aftermath would see Zedekiah's folly in trusting in even the most promising human power, and they would realize that God indeed declares the end from the beginning and brings His word to pass (Is. 46:10–11).

30:1–26. Alas for the Day. In two more oracles, Ezekiel lays out a dateless lament with prophetic elements (vv. 1–19) followed by a dated prophecy about the weakness of Egypt on the world scene (vv. 20–26). In the first oracle, there is an announcement (vv. 1–5), its consequences (vv. 6–9), a description of God's agent (vv. 10–12), and a summary of judgment (vv. 13–19). In language similar to the Day of Yahweh motif in other prophetic books (i.e., clouds or thick darkness; Joel 2:2; Zeph. 1:15), Egypt was called on to wail (Ezek. 30:2), for God's judgment through warfare (“sword,” v. 4; cf. 7:1–27) would encompass the entire land of Egypt (Migdol to Syene, 30:6) and devastate Egypt's economic and military infrastructures (vv. 4–10). Military treaties, paid mercenaries, and trade usually sustained cordial relationships between nations (Jer. 46:9), but now Egypt and its allies would no longer present an option for Israel's faithless overtures. Nebuchadnezzar would take the resources that enabled Egypt to remain a superpower for so long: land and money. After the Saite Dynasty (664–525 B.C.), Egypt was controlled by a succession of foreign empires. The country was annexed by Cambyses of Persia (525 B.C.), then by Alexander the Great (332 B.C.), and finally by Rome (30 B.C.). The litany of toponyms (place names) emphasizes how God's judgment would affect all the major links in Egyptian life, especially its geographically significant areas and well-known religious centers, and this would prevent coordinated coalitions and cultural solidarity.

In the second oracle (Ezek. 30:20–26), God proclaimed that He had broken Egypt's military might (to “break the arm” indicates the removal of power; cf. Job 38:15; Pss. 10:15; 37:17; Jer. 48:25) and thus frustrated its attempts to intervene in the affairs of Judah. In contrast to the pharaonic art of the period, which featured a strong arm with a raised sword, Ezekiel describes the pharaoh (representing Egypt's military power) with an unattended broken arm that could not hold a sword (Ezek. 30:21). Egypt's strength would atrophy and become incapacitated, limping on for about four decades, until its eventual dispersal amongst the nations (v. 23). The cascade of first-person verbs emphasizes God's providential leading over the movement of history and thus affirms the dream and its interpretation that God gave to king Nebuchadnezzar (vv. 24–25; Dan. 2:1–45). The message to Judah was clear: hope in Egypt's help was fool's gold. After the destruction of Jerusalem, God would send a catastrophe against those people of Judah who had fled to many of the cities mentioned here and were astonishingly engaging in many of the same idolatrous practices that landed them in those places to begin with. By this they would learn the lesson that God's holiness is not confined to one geographical place because He is sovereign over the world (Ezek. 30:19; Jer. 44:1–11).

31:1–18. Fall of a Great Tree. Using a familiar ANE motif of a great tree (vv. 2–9) in his fifth oracle two months later, Ezekiel points to Assyria (v. 3) as a historical lesson for Egypt and for the people of God. Assyria exercised hegemony over such a vast empire and impacted almost every nation by its power. Yet the prophet Isaiah had earlier prophesied that God would hew down Assyria (Is. 10:5–19). Egypt's fruitless attempts to help Assyria against Babylon ended in Assyria's destruction and Egypt's isolation (2 Kin. 24:1–7). Egypt's likeness can be found in Assyria (Ezek. 31:3). The message for the people of God was clear: if in prophetic fulfillment Assyria was broken by the mighty hand of God because of its pride, Egypt's fate would be assured (vv. 10–14) and Judah's folly would be exposed. For over a century, Assyria's fall (Is. 10:5–19), Babylon's ascendancy and judgment (Is. 13:1–22), and finally, Persia's rise (Is. 13:17; 44:24–45:13) had been foretold. Yet Judah still trusted in Egypt's power to deliver. Isaiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel describe the rise and fall of nations to show that the prophetic word had and would come to fruition. God took responsibility for Egypt's demise (Ezek. 31:15–18), and despite human strategies and plans, His judgments carried worldwide significance (v. 16).

32:1–32. Requiem for a Funeral. This prophecy revisits many of the prophetic elements of Egypt's demise as announced two years earlier in chapter 29. Ezekiel was instructed to lift up a lament (32:1–16) over Egypt's descent to the grave with its allies (vv. 17–32). In these last two sayings, dated two months after Jerusalem's fall (vv. 1, 17; cf. 33:21), his funeral dirge blends apocalyptic language, familiar cosmic motifs, and prophetic proclamations as he details the fulfillment of God's victory over Egypt. Suffering from an apparently pride-induced identity crisis, the self-styled lion is described by the Lord as little more than a crocodile (or sea dragon, 29:3) churning up water by thrashing around (32:2). God's providential sovereignty (v. 3; 12:13; Hos. 7:12) among the nations had reduced Egypt to a feast for scavengers (Ezek. 32:3–6).

God's people would be reminded of His victory over Egypt during the Exodus through the language of judgment and the “Day of the Lord” imagery: the land covered in blood, and the darkening of the sun, stars, moon, and land (vv. 7–8; cf. Ex. 7:14–24; 10:21–23; Is. 13:9–11; Amos 8:9). John the Revelator draws together all these themes of judgment in his description of prophetic events throughout Christian history (Rev. 6:12–13; 8:12). God reminded His people that He determines the destiny of nations when He again identified Nebuchadnezzar as His agent of divine judgment (Ezek. 32:11–15; cf. 29:18–19; 30:10, 24–25). Ezekiel proceeds to show how Babylon's destruction of Egypt had shifted international relations. In highly repetitive and formulaic language, each nation is described as languishing in the grave (Heb. she'ol) as victims of Babylon's might. Its reach crossed the then-known world and encompassed a formidable force made up of the temperamental allies of Egypt and Judah (Assyria, Elam, Meshech-Tubal [Anatolia], Edom, the princes of the north [Syria], and Sidon [Phoenicia]). Ezekiel emphasizes that these nations are uncircumcised (32:32), which means they were not in a covenant relationship with God. Judah had failed to carry their mission to the nations. They had not demonstrated the faith of David, who trusted in the living God (1 Sam. 17:26). Instead, they trusted in failed states that were destined for judgment and death. The coming of the Davidic Shepherd would provide hope to those choosing to believe His word (Ezek. 34; Rev. 14:1–5; 22:16).

33:1–33

JERUSALEM FALLS

The interlude of the cosmic conflict between God and Satan depicted in the oracles against the nations places the announcement of the fall of Jerusalem in perspective (Ezek. 24:1–26). Behind the nations' and Israel's idolatrous ways stood a powerful angel striving to usurp the sovereignty of God by obliterating His image through various means. Israel's special status as the people of God had not made them immune to the machinations of the proud cherub. Chapter 33 goes back to events in Jerusalem that focus on the justice of God, a pivotal issue in the conflict. The evidence of God's justice had been presented by Ezekiel and the preceding prophets, yet God's people remained stubborn and rebellious. As the warnings from all the previous prophetic oracles would be fulfilled in the fall of Jerusalem, the foundation for a restored remnant is being laid.

33:1–20

The Watchman and the Justice of God

God encouraged Ezekiel to faithfully carry out his mission as a watchman for the house/people of Israel (v. 7). His role as a watchman (vv. 2–9) is a repetition and intensification of 3:17–19. The responsibility of the people is almost a repetition of 18:21–32. The recurrence of these themes points to a crucial aspect of the cosmic conflict, namely, that the God of judgment and the God of salvation are one and the same and the message is the same. There are no such things as the OT God of vengeance and judgment and the NT God of love and mercy. In fact, God reinforced His unswerving compassion, declaring that He does not take pleasure in the death of the wicked and desperately wants people to turn to Him in faith (33:11; see also 18:21–24). In chapters 3 and 18 the messages pointed toward Judah's judgment, and now the same messages point to their—and by extension to humanity's—hope.

33:21–33

Fall of Jerusalem

Though the city was captured (Heb. hukketah, “is struck down”) in 586 B.C. and the people were dismayed at the destruction of their homes and place of worship, salvation was still available. The present orientation of a person's life is what matters to God. He desires that the wicked repent and return to faith in Him, trusting completely in Him. Yet, the people continued to question the fairness of God because of their suffering (vv. 17, 20; 18:25, 29). But the Lord clarified that they would be judged according to their ways because their works testified to their faith or lack of it (v. 20; cf. James 2:24). The people focused on the quantity of their number rather than the quality of their faith; they lived in continual disobedience to God's revealed will (Ezek. 33:24–26). They epitomized those who hear the blast of the trumpet but do not heed the warning (vv. 4, 31–33).

Two years had passed between the announcement of the siege and the actual fall, so plenty of time was given (1) to see the folly of dependence on Egypt, (2) to recognize the fulfillment of God's previous warnings, and (3) to respond to God's overtures of grace and mercy. Ezekiel's mouth was loosened to begin his pastoral ministry of restoration, focusing on the messianic hope, restoration of Israel, and judgment of the confederacy of evil. Israel might yet live a renewed life in safety. Ezekiel repeats several of Israel's abominations regarding the land, the people, the king, and the temple (see chaps. 5–24), but then he begins to shift toward how God will bring restoration in all these areas (chaps. 34–48).

34:1—39:29

ORACLES OF RESTORATION

In a series of oracles, God's messages now would convey hope—the hope of resurrection and restoration. Before the restoration of the temple and the land, Ezekiel set forth the ultimate basis of hope: the Messianic Davidic King. His rulership must be restored in the hearts of the people or else the restoration of the temple, land, and even the destruction of Israel's enemies would only be an external window dressing. God's purpose is to restore His image in human beings. The rulership of His chosen King pointed to a reign beyond a simple restored political rule. Like Hezekiah and Josiah, this new Davidic King would restore the covenant with God's people, but His reign would also reach and change the human heart.

34:1–31

Restored Covenant and Messianic Hope

Now that God had pointed out what a just society is—one governed by justice and righteousness—He began to establish how that society would come to be. First, godly leadership would reign at the heart of His ordered society. Ezekiel spent much time exposing the problem of leadership. In a language and theme similar to Jeremiah 23, Ezekiel's last woe message uses a familiar ANE metaphor of leaders as shepherds and the community as a flock (sheep). The leaders had been exploiting the people (Ezek. 34:3) through political, economic, and religious manipulation and deception. In a series of six indictments (v. 4) the leaders are exposed and shown to be preying on the people for personal benefit. They were not showing the sacrificial care for God's people that was expected from them (Deut. 15:7, 11). The announcement of the Exile due to the lack of a true shepherd (Ezek. 34:5, 6, 12, 21; Deut. 4:27) points to a string of unfaithful kings, despite the bright spots of Hezekiah and Josiah. God proclaimed through Jeremiah that because of Manasseh's wickedness, Exile would come to Judah (Jer. 15:4; cf. 2 Kin. 21:9).

God's ministry of restoration encompassed care for the vulnerable, weak sheep and judgment on the callous, selfish leaders. While judgment was often brought through the nations during Israel's long history, redemption was only brought through God's specially chosen leader. In the redemption of Israel, it was Moses; in the establishment of Israel's dynastic kingdom, it was David; in Israel's return from exile, it was Ezra and then Nehemiah. The promise of the seed (Gen. 3:15) would be fulfilled, but He would not entrust His restoration project to another king of the current line of the kings of Judah. Though glimmers of hope rested on King Jehoiachin's grandson (Hag. 1:1; Ezra 3:2; cf. Matt. 1:12; Luke 3:37), and in a twist of irony even Cyrus is referred to as God's shepherd (Is. 44:28), the promise of the messianic hope found no fulfillment prior to the first century B.C. The promised shepherd is designated as the Lord's Shepherd (Ezek. 34:23–24; Is. 42:1), and He would be of Davidic lineage (Ezek. 34:23; cf. Is. 11:1). Combining language from Ezekiel 34 and Psalm 23, Jesus pointed to Himself and His ministry as the fulfillment of all of Israel's hopes (John 10:11–21). His statement in John 10:8 alludes to Ezekiel 34:2–4—those who came before Him were thieves and robbers. He stated that He would separate the nations as a shepherd separates sheep and goats in His work of judgment (v. 17; Matt. 25:32–33). Scripture presents Jesus's work as one of restoration (Ezek. 34:25, 30–31; Mark 14:22–26; Rev. 21:3–4). The prophets testified to the work of the promised shepherd, and Jesus showed in word and deed that He alone fulfilled all messianic expectations; in Him alone one flock would be gathered (Ezek. 34:23; cf. Num. 27:17; Mic. 2:12–13; Matt. 9:36; John 10:3). His establishment of the covenant promises of a restored land, safety, and blessing reached beyond the temporal borders of Israel and, as the NT writers explain, pointed to a universal application for a new heaven and new earth, a heavenly Jerusalem, and eternal safety and blessing (2 Cor. 1:19–20; Heb. 12:18–24; Rev. 7:9–17; 21:1–5).

35:1—36:38

Two Mountains, Yahweh's Land, and Honor Restored

When read without the standard versification of most Bibles, it becomes readily apparent that 35:1–15 and 36:1–15 are parallel texts that should be read together. The reference to the mountains of Israel (35:12) provides a clue for comparing the links between these oracles. This is followed by the renewal of the people (36:18–38) and the announcement of the resurrection of the nation (37:1–28), and it concludes with the failure of the final attack of the nations against God's people (38:1—39:29).

35:1—36:15. Mountains. This is the story of two mountains, Mount Seir (Edom) and the mountains of Israel (35:2; 36:1). Ezekiel 35:1–15 proclaims judgment on Mount Seir, and Ezekiel 36:1–15 proclaims salvation to the mountains of Israel. The comparisons in these chapters resonate with the proclamations about Esau and Jacob (Gen. 25:19–28), who over time spiraled into conflict (see Ezek. 25:12–14). The prophets Amos and Obadiah, and later also Malachi, depict this tension of brothers (Amos 1:9; Obad. 10–12; Mal. 1:2–5). In these passages Edom seems to play a symbolic role as the representative of all the nations of the earth (see commentary on Obadiah). Just as in Rebekah's womb two nations struggled, the stress in Ezekiel is on the struggle between the righteous and the wicked. When Israel was unfaithful, their lot was thrown in with the noncovenant peoples. Paul picked up on God's words toward Esau (Ezek. 35:3) and toward Jacob (36:9) to discuss God's promise and divine election (Rom. 9:10–13). His point is that God's grace toward His people is not based on merit but on faith. Ezekiel's seminal expression of this can be seen in chapter 9, where a distinction is made between the righteous and the wicked within Israel. While historically Edom as a nation was ultimately defeated and God restored Israel to the promised land, these two divine oracles illustrate the character of the righteous and the wicked. Mount Seir depicts the arrogance, hostility, and covetousness of a people who wanted to take possession of what they saw as a land abandoned by God (35:10–13). Using language from the Creation narrative and covenant promises in Deuteronomy, the mountains of Israel depict the covenant recipients of God's grace, a reversal of 6:1–14 (36:8–12). Israel would be a new creation. The land is depicted in flourishing terms in preparation for the exiles' homecoming (vv. 6–12). This is an expansion on the theme of the covenant of peace in 34:25–30.

36:16–38. Internal Renewal. Against the backdrop of the restoration of the land and judgment on Judah's enemies, the renewal of the people now comes into view. As God reviewed His reasons for bringing judgment and exile (vv. 17–21; Lev. 18:24–25), He clarified that His work was done because of His holy name or reputation (Ezek. 36:20). Israel did nothing to merit a return to the land, but God is gracious, longsuffering, and merciful (Ex. 34:6–7), and it was necessary that His name be vindicated before the nations (Ezek. 36:23, 36). His sovereignty encompasses all creation, and everyone will know that He is the Lord of grace and justice (vv. 22–23; Rom. 9:14–18). Even the faithful need God's purifying grace (a new heart and a new spirit; Ezek. 36:26). The promise of renewal (a new covenant), fulfilled in the life and work of Jesus, is announced here and in Jeremiah 31:3–34. The work of redemption and regeneration would not replace God's holy law, but it would rather engrave the law on a transformed, submissive, and receptive heart. The role of the Messiah, the Davidic King, would bring this about,<sup>1</sup> as confirmed in the pastoral imagery of Ezekiel 36:37–38. Chapter 34 emphasizes the royal work of the new David; here the priestly work is emphasized (v. 25; Heb. zaraq, “sprinkle,” Num. 8:7; 19:18–19; taher, “cleanse,” Lev. 16:30). The language of a ritual that cleanses from the impurity of corpse contamination (Ezek. 6:1–7; cf. Num. 19:13–20) signifies Israel's need of purification to atone for their idolatry and bloodshed. That regeneration would be made efficacious only by the work of the Spirit (Ezek. 36:27). The doctrine of righteousness by faith has been the keystone of God's plan from the foundation of the world (Rev. 13:8). The litany of first-person verbs in Ezekiel 36:24–30 emphasizes the providential leading of God and His role in the work of restoration. The promised divine enabling is captured in a beautiful literary chiasm in v. 27:

- A God would “cause” or “move” (Heb. ‘asah, “make, do”) the people
- B They would “walk” or “follow” (Heb. halak) God's principles
- B' They would observe (Heb. shamar, “keep, guard”) God's decrees
- A' They would be careful to keep (Heb. ‘asah, “make, do”) God's rules

Yahweh's work of building and planting is a picture of the restored covenant community that He would establish (v. 36; see also 28:26; Is. 65:21; Jer. 24:6) and a reversal of the judgment of uninhabited houses and unfruitful vines (Deut. 28:30; cf. Zeph. 1:13). God would restore the remnant, a holy and consecrated people, as a testimony to His grace and power.

37:1–28

Valley of Dry Bones

Ezekiel relays another vivid visionary experience similar to his encounters with Yahweh in chapters 1–3, 8–11, and 40–48. The parallels with other visionary experiences indicate that here God's justice had come full circle: a similar setting (a valley, 3:22–23; 37:1; the city, 8:3; 40:1); the hand of the Lord upon him (3:22; 8:1; 37:1; 40:1); the work of the Spirit (3:24; 8:3; 37:1, 10; 40:2); the vision of God is combined with “spirit of God” in 11:24); and a divine question (8:6; 37:3). The first two visionary experiences deal with judgment and death, and the last two deal with resurrection and life. In chapter 37 we find a great message of hope for God's people. What hope of life can there be for very dry bones? God's question to Ezekiel in the vision narrative (vv. 1–10), “Can these bones live?” evokes a response of faith and points to His sovereignty. Ezekiel would have been familiar with the possibility of resurrection based on the experiences of the prophets Elijah (1 Kin. 17:17–24) and Elisha (2 Kin. 4:32–37). In the interpretation of the vision (Ezek. 37:11–14), Yahweh explained to Ezekiel that the bones represented all of Israel. Continuing the theme of ritual contamination from Numbers (Num. 19:14–16), whoever would touch Israel's bones would be defiled, but astonishingly the ritual contamination does not apply because the Life Giver is present and His life enlivens, purifies, and sanctifies—something that the blood of animal sacrifice could not do (Heb. 10:1–7). He gives life, and as in His original creation of humans, He would breathe into lifeless matter and human beings would come into existence (Ezek. 37:9; Gen. 2:7). In this chapter we see a graphic reversal of death and decay, reiterating the fact that the Lord has power over death. It presents the prophecy that the lifeless, dry bones of Israel will be brought back to life by the word of God. As at Creation, the Lord breathed into a human and he became a living being, so here the spirit (Heb. ruakh, “spirit,” “wind,” “breath”) entered the lifeless bodies and they became living beings once again. The vision of the dry bones also gives an assurance of resurrection.

Ezekiel’s performance of the sign-act, consisting of bringing two sticks together, depicted the reunification of Israel and Judah (Ezek. 37:15–20; cf. 33:23, 29; Jer. 3:18; 23:5–6; Hos. 1:11; Amos 9:11). This reunification must be seen in its cosmic context. Israel, like humankind, was brought to life to live in relationship with God and fulfill His will in their election. The promised Seed spoken of in Genesis 3:15 would come through the royal line of Judah (Gen. 49:8–10; Num. 24:15–17). Scripture presents God’s restoration of Israel to the land as carrying the profound purpose of universal hope (Gen. 12:1–3, 7; Matt. 1; Luke 3:23–38; Gal. 3:16). The faithful kings of Judah, Hezekiah and Josiah, strove to incorporate the people within the former Northern Kingdom into a covenant hope (2 Kin. 23:15–20; 2 Chr. 30:1–12). This hope of reunion was also a mainstay among the prophets who drew from God’s covenant promises to Abraham (Is. 11:12–13; Jer. 3:6–18; Hos. 1:10–11). This point is brought out in the interpretation (Ezek. 37:21–28). The two kingdoms would have one king over them—the Messiah, the new David, their Shepherd—who would establish an everlasting covenant of peace (v. 26; cf. Gen. 17:7, 13, 19; 2 Sam. 23:5; Is. 24:5; 55:3; Jer. 32:40). Righteousness would prevail under the Davidic Shepherd (Ezek. 37:23–24). The promise of the restoration of the sanctuary meant that God would reestablish His presence, covenant, salvation, and vindication in connection with the work of the Messiah (vv. 24–28). The sanctuary and its place in the plan of salvation become the main focus of the concluding chapters of the book (chaps. 40–48).

38:1—39:29

Gog and Magog

This oracle of judgment ends the section on the restoration of the people of Israel. Several features connect these two chapters: (1) both begin the same way, (2) the main antagonist is the same (Gog of Magog), (3) there is a cohesive storyline of war and judgment, and (4) the result is the same (all the nations will know that the Lord is God; 38:16, 23; 39:6, 13, 21, 28). There are several factors to keep in mind when interpreting this prophecy. First, Ezekiel uses geographic references from the Table of Nations in Genesis 10 to give a worldwide scope to his vision. Magog is the second of the Japhethite nations (Gen. 10:2), and several of the other nations can be found in Genesis 10:2–6. Second, the use of this prophecy in the book of Revelation highlights an apocalyptic/eschatological fulfillment applied directly to Satan after the millennium (Rev. 20:1–10). Also in Ezekiel, this prophecy is one that would take place in the future (Ezek. 38:8, 16).

Indeed, 38:17 is a key verse that refers to previous prophecies about Gog. However, nowhere in Scripture is a direct prophecy about Gog ever mentioned. The intertextual biblical parallels suggest that this refers to a conglomerate of previous prophetic oracles concerning Israel’s enemies and indicates a theological interpretation of the passage.

It is probably better to follow the storyline of the prophecy and comment on a few motifs that emerge from this cosmic war between good and evil. In broad terms, what is described is the summons to war (38:1–9) and the defeat of Gog (vv. 10–23), followed by the disposal of Gog (39:1–29). Gog was the commander-in-chief (Heb. nesi’ ro’sh, “chief prince”; some translations render the Heb. ro’sh as a place name—“prince of Rosh”) of Meshech and Tubal (38:2, 3, 5–6, 15). God would force him to assemble with all his allies, encompassing an unholy alliance of seven nations from the remotest parts of the known world: as far east as Persia (Paras), as far north as Anatolia (Gomer), and as far west as Libya (Egypt) (27:10; 30:5; 38:16–17). They would assemble against Israel (i.e., against the returnees from captivity; 38:8–9, 11–13), who is described in language reminiscent of chapters 34–37. Like the king of Assyria, Gog’s ambitions would be to conquer Israel and enrich itself (38:13; cf. 27:15–22; Is. 10:5–14). In a time when the returnees of Israel would rest securely, trusting in the Lord (38:8–12, 14), Gog would proceed from the farthest parts of the north (cf. Is. 14:13). But forewarned of God’s promise of judgment, Gog and his allies would be broken (Ezek. 38:14). The creation language mixed with imagery of the Divine Warrior, similar to descriptions of the cosmic upheaval in the plagues of the Exodus, and the conquering of Canaan signals Yahweh’s victory and the confounding of the enemy (vv. 15–23; 39:3; Gen. 1; Ex. 9–15; Josh. 1–10). Through the defeat of Gog and his allies, the nations would know that the Lord is God (Ezek. 38:23).

Chapter 39 expands on the judgment against Gog with details of the defeat. It remains clear that when the Lord fought Gog, He would do so to protect and defend His chosen people (i.e., the house of Israel) for His name's sake. The chapter emphasizes that what would take place would be the last judgment; the tragic events of 586 B.C. would not happen again (Ezek. 39:29). Israel would have a new king, a renewed land, no foes, and a clear understanding of their guilt. The covenant promise of God's presence is in view here; He would not hide his face, meaning that His people would see Him in His glory. His Spirit would enable justice and righteousness to function without deterrent.

The destruction of these nations from the ends of the earth represents an ultimate attempt by the joint forces of evil to destroy the tranquility of God's people. Revelation's use of this text and others like it indicates that those prophecies are applied theologically in the context of the cosmic conflict between Christ and Satan. Two motifs that emerge from these chapters express this principle: the Day of the Lord and the Defeat of the Nations. (1) The Day of the Lord: Ezekiel's expressions "after many days" (38:8; Dan. 8:26), "in the latter years" (Ezek. 38:8), "in the latter days" (v. 16; Dan. 2:28; 10:14), and "on that day" (Ezek. 39:11) give a general future time framework for this prophecy. The use of phrases such as "the Day of the Lord," "in the latter days," and "in future years" is typical of eschatological passages. Thus, eschatological judgment and victory are in view here. (2) The Defeat of the Nations: in chapter 37, God's Spirit transforms a valley of dry bones into a living community, while in chapter 39 God reduces a numberless throng to a valley of bones (37:1-14; 39:11-15). Israel would spend seven months burying the corpses of Gog and his multitude in order to cleanse the land (39:12-16). By this time, the land of Israel would have been already restored, so a worldwide cleansing is in view. The defeat of the nations means a cessation of antagonism toward the people of God, and it means a restored world. The number seven (v. 12) also points toward the completeness of victory.

40:1—48:35

VISION OF GOD AND HIS REVIVED PEOPLE

Like chapters 38-39, chapters 40-48 are a vision that appears to deal with "theological geography" rather than literal geography. To be sure, the contours of the land and the dimensions of the temple are described in realistic fashion, but the application has no literal fulfillment in human history; it was never built, and there was never an attempt to build it. Israel's hope lay in the presence of God with His people, the return of the King, and the reestablishment of the covenant apparatus of land, law, and leadership. Through Ezekiel, God was inviting His people to view their renewal and hope as being beyond the normal expectations of ritual. Ezekiel's plan for the temple is described in a language that has many parallels with the construction of the wilderness tabernacle and the temple of Jerusalem (40:1—43:27; Ex. 36-40; 1 Kin. 6:1—8:21). Coupled with the Davidic hope, the promise of a new temple inspired the returning, postexilic priests and prophets to rebuild the temple (Ezra 2-3; 5; Neh. 2-3; 6:1—7:3; Hag. 1:1—2:23; Zech. 2-3; 8). Ezekiel presents the ritual laws of the new temple as patterned after many laws found in the Pentateuch (Ezek. 44:1—46:24; Ex. 21-23; Lev. 1-7; Deut. 12-26). Finally, the allotments of the land are described similarly to the tribal allotments in Numbers 34:1-12. The visionary descriptions carry a degree of familiarity that conjures memories of the grace God expressed in the giving of the sanctuary, law, land, and leadership. Revelation's use of this section in its description of the New Jerusalem points to a NT understanding in eschatological rather than literal terms (cf. Rev. 21-22).

40:1—43:27

Temple Restored

Structurally, Ezekiel's vision revisits Israel (8:1). The vision related in chapter 8, from about twenty years previously, was of God abandoning His sanctuary, which fell, along with Jerusalem, to the Babylonians. One can imagine Ezekiel's anxiety as he now encounters another being similar to the one he interacted with as judgment commenced on Israel (8:2; 40:3). One can also imagine his hope as this new vision, according to priestly reckoning, was around the time of the Passover (Ex. 12:2-3). His experience, mediated in apocalyptic sensory form ("see" and "hear," Ezek. 40:4; cf. Rev. 1:10-12; 7:4, 9; 14:1-2), was also similar to the apocalyptic visions facilitated by a supernatural being (Dan. 10:2-9; Rev. 17:1). He saw something like a city structure on a very high mountain. He entered the city and was given a tour of a complex like a fortress with guardrooms at the entrance (Ezek. 40:5-7; cf. 1 Kin. 14:28). He began and ended at the outer court entrance of the temple. This spatial description is important because this was where God's glory would enter the temple complex; it was the same point from where He exited because of the abominations that took place in the temple before it was destroyed (Ezek. 43:1–5; cf. 10:18–22; 11:23). At the end of his tour, Ezekiel was taken out to see God's entrance from the east, where the sights and sounds evoked awe, reverence, and a sign of hope (1:24, 28). The reference to the glory of the Lord filling the temple (43:5) indicates a divine acceptance and inauguration (vv. 12–27). A similar reference also appears in connection with the inception of the wilderness tabernacle (43:5, cf. 42:15; Exod. 40:34–35) as well as the temple of Solomon (1 Kin. 8:10–11).

The key word “measure” is mentioned thirty times in this section (e.g., Ezek. 40:27; 41:1, 5, 13; 42:15, 20). The man with the measuring rod measured the wall (40:5), the temple (vv. 6–49), and the hekal—usually translated as “temple” but here rendered variously as “sanctuary,” “main hall,” or “nave” (41:1–4). The passage from 41:5 to 42:20 provides further descriptions and measurements of the temple. Not only do these measurements speak of the architectural precision of the temple, but as Zechariah also later expressed, they indicate that it would be ready to welcome its divine inhabitant and for Him to receive joyful songs of praise (Ps. 137:1–6; Zech. 1:16; 2:2). The priests would once more administer the sacrifices (Ezek. 40:39–46; 42:13–14). Ezekiel was moved closer to the inner court, into the interior of the temple, but was not taken into the Most Holy Place (41:4). Though different in some respects, the general layout is similar to Solomon's temple, which is described in 1 Kings 6:1–37. The scarcity of detail concerning the Holy and Most Holy Places suggests that Ezekiel was not being shown an architectural plan to be followed, but a vision of the gradations of the sacred space where the cherubim and palm trees evoke the hope of a new creation (Gen. 1–2; 3:24; Rev. 7:9–17). The function of the temple was finally revealed to Ezekiel—radiating from the top of the mountain, everything around it became holy ground. With no need for a royal palace like Solomon's, Israel's King would rule from His throne room in the temple (Ezek. 43:7; 1 Kin. 7:7). The return of the glory of the Lord (Ezek. 43:2–7) required that Israel put away idolatry and seek the Lord (vv. 9–11), who tabernacles among His people (vv. 12–27).

44:1—46:24

The Torah Restored and the Prince

Since Ezekiel's focus had shifted to the rules and procedures regulating the activities in the temple, he exited its complex precincts and was informed that only the Prince had entered through this entrance; His status is thus associated with the Lord (44:1–3; 43:4; 46:12). Usually, the word “prince” (Heb. nasi') in Ezekiel denotes a political role, namely, the leader of the Jewish community (7:27; 12:10; 21:25; cf. 1 Kin. 11:34). Ezekiel also uses the term to refer to the Davidic Messiah (Ezek. 34:24; 37:25). His special access to the temple reflected the idea of a special processional entrance open only to the honorable (Pss. 15; 24). The focus on the glory of the Lord filling the temple (Ezek. 44:4) shows that this Davidic King would have access to the very presence of the Lord, which is reminiscent of Moses at Sinai (cf. Ex. 19–24). Yet in this case, the laws address a superior quality of sanctity and a more rigorous form of access and ritual purity (Ezek. 44:5–14). Even though Yahweh directly gave him laws, Moses could not enter into the presence of God when His glory filled the tabernacle (Ex. 34:34–35). Ezekiel presents the Prince as having a special relationship with Yahweh: not only having access to the Lord's presence but also having a deep covenant relationship with Him (Ezek. 44:3; cf. 34:23–24; 37:24–28). The book mentions the rebellions of Israel (44:6), how they brought uncircumcised foreigners who profaned the temple (vv. 7–9), and how the Levites deserted God (vv. 10–11). As far as the priests are concerned, only the Zadokite priests would approach to minister before the Lord. These priests are presented as showing sacrificial fidelity, but stricter regulations apply to them concerning ministry, including whom they could marry and how they would arbitrate among the people (vv. 15–31).

The purity required in this new temple emphasizes that the maintenance of God's holiness would be of a different order than in the past. In anticipation of the fuller account of the allotment of the land (47:13–23; 48:1–35), holiness would radiate outward from God's holy mountain to the land—the Priest and the Prince would extend the purity of the temple (45:1–9). The bulk of the material emphasizes the special status and responsibilities of the Prince as a leader (44:3; 45:7–9; 46:10, 12, 16–18), and it emphasizes the maintenance of holiness through ritual (45:1–25), through worship (Sabbath and New Moon, 46:1–15), and through equity in land inheritances (vv. 16–18). The book of Revelation picks up on this theme and expands on the faithful being closest to the presence of the Lord with the Davidic King on the mountain of God (Rev. 14:1–5; cf. 1:6).

47:1—48:29

The Land Restored

Ezekiel's temple tour concluded at the entrance of the temple proper, where he saw a stream of water coming from beneath the temple and flowing east (47:1–12). What started out as a trickle eventually became so deep that it was over Ezekiel's head, and it was going out into the land. The healing property of the water was rejuvenating the driest portion of the land (the Dead Sea area) and preparing for the description of the purified land, recalling the Edenic fertility and Zion's hope (Gen. 2:10–14; Pss. 46:4; 65:9). Revelation's portrayal of the renewed earth uses Ezekiel's description of the waters of the river of life healing the people (Rev. 22:1–2).

Ezekiel builds on his earlier picture of a restored people of God (Ezek. 47:13; cf. 37:15–28). The inheritance of the twelve tribes and the allotment of the land recall God's victory during the wilderness wanderings (Josh. 13:1–21:45). However, in Ezekiel, contrary to earlier biblical descriptions, Israel's former enemies had been destroyed (Ezek. 38–39). The account of the division of the land in chapter 48 elaborates on the brief account in chapter 45; its borders were already demarcated in chapter 47. The allotment of sections of the land follows this order: (1) sections for the first seven tribes (48:1–7; cf. 45:6); (2) a holy district set apart for the Lord—for the priests and the temple (with the temple in the center; 48:8–12; cf. 45:1–4); (3) a section for the Levites (48:13–14; cf. 45:5); (4) the common land (48:15–20); (5) the portion for the prince (vv. 21–22; cf. 45:7–9); and (6) sections for the last five tribes (48:23–28; cf. 45:6). The foreigners or strangers, resident aliens (47:22–23) who are “grafted” into the people of God, would experience the same covenant benefits of inheritance (cf. Rom. 11:11–24). The book of Ezekiel ends on a note of hope for all people who choose to be a part of God's family.

48:30–35

The City Restored

Ezekiel's prophetic account concludes with the restoration of the people and the land, ending with a picture of hope: God reigns while the world remains at rest. The book of Revelation picks up this covenant rest when it focuses on the twelve gates named after the twelve tribes, representing the royalty of the people of God (vv. 30–35; Rev. 21:12). Revelation expands Ezekiel's picture of the ultimate covenant blessing. The Hebrew name of the city would be yahweh shammah (“The LORD Is There”) which symbolizes Yahweh's promise to dwell among His people (Ezek. 48:35). This remains the hope of God's people (Rev. 22:4–5, 17). The book of Ezekiel closes the way it began, focusing on the God of all glory and hope.

DANIEL

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The Hebrew name of the book is daniyye'l, rendered in English as “Daniel,” meaning “God is my judge.” It appears to have been a common name in the Semitic world. The book is named after its main character, a young man from Judah called Daniel who was taken into exile in Babylon. Although there have been debates concerning the author of the book, the book itself indicates that the Prophet Daniel wrote it (e.g., Dan. 12:4). The historicity of Daniel is confirmed by Jesus (Matt. 24:15).

Date. The date for the composition of Daniel has been a topic of disagreement among scholars. Critical scholars, influenced by rationalism and its denial of divine intervention in history, have rejected predictive prophecy and therefore sought arguments to date the book to the second century B.C. They believe that Daniel’s so-called predictions were written after the events had taken place, that is, after the empires of Babylon, Medo-Persia, and Greece had already disappeared from history. The book was written, they claim, to provide meaning and encouragement to the Jews in the mid-second century B.C. in their struggle with the Syrian king Antiochus IV Epiphanes, with whom the book ends. But when all evidence is taken into consideration, the liberal position is either ambiguous or lacks clear historical support. Interestingly, in the manuscripts from Qumran, written in the second century B.C., the book of Daniel was already well known and considered an authoritative prophetic book. Conservative Christians, including Seventh-day Adventists, who take into consideration the historical and chronological information found in Daniel, believe that it was written by the Prophet Daniel in the sixth century B.C.

Backgrounds. When Nabopolassar ascended to the throne of Babylon (626 B.C.), the Neo-Assyrian Empire underwent a rapid decline.

The Medes captured Assur in 614 B.C., and Nabopolassar, in alliance with the Medes, took Nineveh, the Neo-Assyrian capital, in 612 B.C. The final collapse of the Neo-Assyrian Empire occurred during the battle of Carchemish in 605 B.C. In the same year, Nabopolassar died and his son Nebuchadnezzar II became king of the Neo-Babylonian Empire. It was also the year when Daniel, as a young man, was taken to Babylon. He served at the court of Nebuchadnezzar as minister and counselor. After the Persians conquered Babylon in 539 B.C., he also served under Darius the Mede and the Persian king Cyrus. During his long and distinguished career, Daniel consistently displayed a profound trust in God, regardless of circumstances. He served God faithfully to the end of his days (sometime after 536 B.C.).

Theology and Purpose. The book of Daniel is formed by a series of historical narratives and a series of apocalyptic prophecies. The historical conflict Daniel and his friends experienced was a microcosm of the cosmic conflict depicted in the prophetic chapters. This conflict provides a theological center to the book around which other theological topics are developed.

1. God’s Sovereignty. The God of Daniel is indeed the Lord of history. History is the arena in which the cosmic conflict between God and the powers of evil takes place. Throughout the book it is repeatedly demonstrated that in spite of the efforts of human instrumentalities, behind which evil powers are at work (Dan. 10:12–13) to destroy God’s faithful servants, God is always able to deliver them. The acknowledgment of His sovereignty is expressed by the willingness of God’s people to worship Him at any cost.

2. God’s Messiah. God’s most important instrument in this cosmic battle is His Messiah, the Son of Man (7:13–14). Historical narratives in Daniel record His deliverance of His servants from the attacks of their enemies

(3:19–30; 6:18–22), and the prophetic words in Daniel promise He will do the same during the last eschatological drama (12:1). The messianic prophecy of the seventy weeks points to the time when the Messiah, the hope of God's people, would come to procure salvation for them. He would be the sacrifice to bring to an end all the animal sacrifices by giving His life for the world (9:26–27).

3. Judgment. The book begins and ends with references to judgment: apostate Israel is judged at the beginning (1:1–2), and the king of the north is judged at the end (11:40–12:2). The middle of the book (7:9–13) portrays God as the Ancient of Days, with the books of judgment open and multitudes of angels present. On each side of this great judgment scene, we find further references to judgment. In Daniel 4 heaven judges Nebuchadnezzar, the proud boaster, and humbles him to animal status, and in chapter 5 Belshazzar, his grandson, receives the message that he has been evaluated and found wanting (v. 27). Chapters 8 and 9 indicate the beginning date of the pre-advent judgment, and chapter 12 spells out its significance concerning rewards and punishments.

4. Vindication of God's People. Daniel places great emphasis on the people of God on earth and on their struggles against the forces of evil. The historical chapters of the book (Dan. 1–6) illustrate how God vindicates and delivers those who remain faithful in the midst of a pagan nation. These chapters contain the motif of trial and trouble ending in elevation and glory. Thus, the good news that trials and temptations are followed by blessings for those obedient to God is continually proclaimed, anticipating the full realization of the hope that at the Second Coming of the Messiah all trials and temptations will come to an end.

Literary Features. Daniel was written in two languages, namely, Hebrew (1:1–2:4a; 8:1–12:13) and Aramaic (2:4b–7:28). The reason for this particular phenomenon is unknown, but perhaps it could be said that when dealing with the rulers of worldly empires, Daniel decided to use Aramaic (the diplomatic language of these empires), whereas the sections written in Hebrew deal primarily with matters important to the people of God.

The book is divided into two parts: the first six chapters primarily contain narrative (chaps. 1, 3–6), while the last six contain visions (chaps. 7–12). The climax in each narrative is the elevation of the worshipers of the true God, and each vision ends with the establishment of the kingdom of God. The worshipers of the true God are associated with the kingdom of God. The first chapter tells the story of the destruction of God's earthly kingdom, Judah, while the last chapter promises the establishment of His heavenly kingdom, which will last forever. Daniel 2 and 7 contain visionary symbols and their interpretation. The first half of chapter 8 again contains a symbolic vision, but after 8:14 most of the symbolism is dropped, indicating that 8:14 is the climax of the symbolism of the book. In the next verse the explanation begins; it is continued in 9:24–27 and enlarged upon in chapters 10–12. In other words, the rest of the book seems to be a development and explanation of the symbolic vision in chapter 8 or a new revelation in the form of an audition.

Interpretation of the Book. The history of the interpretation of Daniel is quite extensive. We will only offer a brief description of the major interpretational systems used for the understanding of the book of Daniel.

1. Historicist School. This is the oldest school of interpretation. It accepts the authorship of Daniel in the sixth century B.C. and holds that the prophecies of Daniel cover the entire historical period from Daniel's day to the Second Advent of Christ. Seventh-day Adventists are historicists (see "Interpreting Biblical Apocalyptic Prophecies," p. 46).

2. Futurist-Dispensational School. Interpreters of this school also accept Danielic authorship in the sixth century B.C., but they believe that the little horn power in Daniel 7 is a future antichrist rather than apostate Christianity. This school can be divided into two groups: (a) dispensationalists, who believe that there is a gap in the fulfillment of the prophecies of Daniel from the first century until seven years before the Second Advent; and (b) futurists, who believe that from the destruction of the Roman Empire (the fourth beast) until the appearance of the antichrist (the little horn) there will be a number of kingdoms (the ten horns), which are the successors to the Roman Empire.

3. The Historical Preterist School. Like historicists and futurist-dispensationalists, historical preterists believe that Daniel wrote the book in the sixth century B.C., but they limit the fulfillment of its prophecies to the time period which runs from the time of Daniel to the first coming of Christ, or to the end of the Roman Empire.

4. The Historical-Critical or Modern Preterist School. Adherents of this school hold that an unknown Jew in the second century B.C. wrote the book of Daniel. They believe that all the prophecies in the book end in the time of Antiochus IV Epiphanes, in the second century B.C., and that the book is a reflection of the political and religious situation of the Jewish people during the time of persecution under that Syrian king.

COMMENTARY

1:1–21

GLIMPSSES OF JUDGMENT AND RESTORATION

The first chapter of Daniel introduces a number of topics that will surface several times and in different ways throughout the rest of the book. It begins with a description of the result of God's judgment against His people (vv. 1–2) and proceeds to describe an effort to influence Daniel and his friends to adopt the Babylonian culture (vv. 3–7). The issue of diet illustrates how important it is to preserve one's identity in a setting of conflict (vv. 8–14). The chapter ends describing the results of remaining loyal to the Lord (vv. 15–21). Daniel and his friends model what it means to be faithful servants of the Lord in a context of opposition while waiting for deliverance.

1:1–2. Inevitable Results of Disobedience.

The fall of Jerusalem mentioned here took place in the year 605 B.C. Daniel lived in the sixth century and was a contemporary of Nebuchadnezzar. Here he is not simply recounting casual historical incidents but also identifying the cause of the events: the Lord ensured that Jehoiakim would be defeated and given over to Nebuchadnezzar (v. 2). The biblical obituary of Jehoiakim states that he did evil in the Lord's estimation, just as those who came before him had done (2 Kin. 23:37), and Judah did the same (2 Kin. 24:3). Daniel begins his narrative describing God's judgment against His people and His sovereignty over history. He records the conflict between Babylon and Jerusalem; Jerusalem represents the rule of righteousness and Babylon the rule of evil. The first time we read of Babylon and Jerusalem in Scripture is in the book of Genesis; the last time we hear of them is in the book of Revelation. The stories and prophecies of the book illustrate the Great Controversy between good and evil.

1:3–7. Conflicting Identities. Daniel and his three Jewish companions (Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah) were selected to obtain the best education Babylon (Shinar) could offer them. This opportunity would make it possible for them to change their social status as prisoners of war or slaves to that of Babylonian scholars or wise men. In the process, their faith was to be seriously tested. First, they were offered a new Babylonian identity by being given Babylonian names. This was part of a larger purpose of gradually transforming their allegiance to Babylon and its gods. The new names associated Daniel and his companions with Babylonian deities (v. 7). So Daniel, which means "God is my judge," was changed to Belteshazzar, "may Bel [another name for Marduk, the principal god of Babylon] preserve his life." Hananiah ("the grace of God") was named Shadrach ("the command of Aku," a Babylonian god). Mishael ("who is like God") became Meshach ("who is like Aku"). Finally, Azariah ("God has helped") was named Abednego ("servant of Nebo," another name of Marduk).

1:8–14. Babylonian Diet. The second attempt at Babylonian indoctrination came through a new lifestyle. It was the king, not the Lord, who carefully determined what they should eat and drink. In fact, they would eat from the table of the king. The meal would have included unclean foods and food offered to the Babylonian deities. This test over eating and drinking seems insignificant, but the first test recorded in the Bible (Gen. 3) also seems to have been insignificant; it too concerned appetite. At times, the depth of love is best revealed in the little things we do. Great doors often swing on little hinges. Genesis 3 and Daniel 1 illustrate that Satan always endeavors to reach us through our senses. Successful Christian living, therefore, depends on the adequate control of the senses.

Daniel and his friends decided not to defile themselves with the king's food and wine (1:8). The request from Daniel and his companions must have seemed very strange and even foolish to the Babylonian officers. But the Lord used Daniel's kindness to gain him the respect and sympathy of the chief of the eunuchs (v. 9), a high court official, and he assented to their request and tested them for ten days (v. 14).

Daniel's diet was nothing particularly new but was based on faithfulness to God's will for him and his friends. They asked for a simple and wholesome plant-based diet and water (v. 12). The term zero'im (plural of zeroa') used in v. 12 (usually translated as “vegetables”) is related to the one used in Genesis 1:29 to designate the original diet assigned by God to humans. The Hebrew young men were going back to God’s original diet.

1:15–21. Blessings of Obedience. Under God’s influence, the ten days were enough to show that the diet established by God was the best. The four young men were in better health than any of the other young men who had been eating the king’s food (v. 15). A battle had been won. They also excelled in their education in literature and wisdom (v. 17). However, this was not directly credited to their diet but to the Lord who gave them such capacities. In other words, God blessed their faithfulness and gave them more than they expected. When they went before the king for their final examination, he witnessed their superiority over the other students. It was ten times better, and as a result they were given jobs close to the king himself (vv. 19–20). Daniel and his three friends were able to remain faithful to God through “the right exercise of the will” (SC 48), through the recognition of the influence of the body on the mind (CD 154), and through a prayerful dependence on God (SL 20). What helped Daniel and his friends in their walk with God remains true for every follower of Christ today.

Daniel 1:21 is the epilogue of the chapter. The chapter starts describing the people of God as having been taken captive to Babylon, but it ends with a reference to Cyrus, the king who brought the captivity of the people to an end by allowing them to return to Israel. He is described by Isaiah in messianic terms as the liberator of God’s people (Is. 44:28). According to Daniel, not all was dark; there was a happy ending on the horizon. At the beginning of the chapter, there is hardly any hope left for the people, but at the end there is a glimpse of hope for them. The Deliverer would be coming. The book of Daniel is designed to inspire hope in the midst of a cosmic conflict for those who put their trust in the Lord and remain loyal to Him.

2:1–49

GOD INTRODUCES NEBUCHADNEZZAR TO HIS KINGDOM

Four facts stand out in this chapter: the complete uselessness of divination to forecast the future (vv. 1–13); God as the only One who knows the future (vv. 14–30); the miracle of prophecy (vv. 31–45); and God’s invitation to Nebuchadnezzar to become part of His kingdom (vv. 46–49).

2:1–13. Control over the Future. Nebuchadnezzar was worried about the future of his kingdom. The God of Israel, who cares for all peoples, listened to his concern and spoke to him in a dream. The dream captured the attention and interest of the king. He apparently could not remember all of its details but remembered enough to realize that its content was important. He needed two things, a full description of the dream and its interpretation. In the ancient Near East, the dreams of a king were extremely important, for they were considered to be messages from the gods announcing, among other things, possible misfortunes for the king or the kingdom. Therefore, it was important for the king to know about these matters in order to perform certain rituals that would protect him, his family, and the kingdom. Dreams could be a matter of national security. What Nebuchadnezzar was doing was not strange at all.

Kings had professional interpreters of dreams and people who could use different means of divination to predict the future. In the case of Nebuchadnezzar, he had a group of wise persons trained in the art of divination and in the interpretation of dreams. He decided to call a meeting of those skilled in divination. Human wisdom would be seriously tested. It was precisely the wise persons who immediately realized the limits of human wisdom. They possessed different techniques for divination, but they had not developed one that would allow them to recover a forgotten dream. They argued that no one on earth could do what the king was asking them to do and, further, that no ruler had ever asked for such a thing (v. 10). In other words, what the king was requesting was not only irrational but, since it lacked a legal antecedent, was an arbitrary demand.

The king was abruptly confronted by the limits of human wisdom, and consequently, he was frustrated. If wisdom is so useless, who needs it? Angry and frustrated, Nebuchadnezzar ordered that all the wise men of Babylon were to be executed (v. 12). Among them were Daniel and his friends (v. 13). Perhaps they had not been invited to the meeting because they were considered young and inexperienced, but their fate was the same as that of all of the others.

2:14–30. God's Lordship over the Future.

What first impacted Daniel was the urgency of the king's command. Once properly informed, Daniel went to see the king to ask him for time so that he could inform him of the dream's interpretation (v. 16). The wise men of Babylon complained about the impossibility of the task, but this young man told the king that what he was requesting was not impossible. All he needed was time—time to pray that God would reveal to them the secret (or mystery) of the interpretation in order for them to be delivered from death. Daniel opted for the only way out of the problem, namely, divine intervention. This possibility had been considered by the magicians, astrologers, and Chaldeans, but they concluded that this was impossible because the gods do not share that information with humans (v. 11). However, the God of Daniel knows all mysteries and could reveal them to His servants the prophets. And the secret (or mystery) was revealed to Daniel (v. 19).

After receiving the revelation, Daniel gave thanks and glory to God. In his prayer, which is a doxology, Daniel identified God as the source of true wisdom (v. 20) and as the One who has control over the flow of history (v. 21). This wonderful God is willing to provide wisdom and knowledge, as well as to reveal deep, hidden, secret things to humans (vv. 21–23). After talking to the King of kings, the young man was ready to talk to the king of Babylon. In order to highlight the limits of human wisdom, Daniel told the king that there were no wise men that could reveal the mystery the king had requested (v. 27). This is the first time that Daniel is described as testifying before the king on behalf of God. What the king had demanded could be done by a God he did not know but who would be introduced to him by Daniel (v. 28). It is this God, unknown to the king, who had made known to King Nebuchadnezzar what would be in the future (lit. “days of the end” or “latter days”). In this case that future reached from the days of Nebuchadnezzar to the advent of the stone kingdom. Daniel did not take any personal credit. It was revealed to him for the benefit of the king and in order for the king to know what had been in his mind (lit. “heart”; v. 30).

2:31–45. Prophecy and History.

Daniel would give the king what he had requested, namely, the dream and its interpretation. He dreamed about a colossal image of a man made of different materials. This type of image was common in the ANE. Images were made to represent the gods (idols) or the king. In this particular case, it was a royal image because it would represent the king and the kingdoms. Its head was of fine, pure gold; the arms and the chest were made of silver; the abdomen and thighs of bronze; the legs of iron; and the feet were a mixture of iron and clay (vv. 32–33). The metals decreased in value but increased in strength, except for the feet. The feet made the image vulnerable and anticipated its final collapse. In the dream, the king saw a stone or rock, which was cut without human hands (i.e., not of human origin), hit the image on its feet, blowing it apart. Daniel used the language of winnowing to express the effortlessness with which the image was destroyed. It was as easy as separating the grain from the chaff that is blown away by the wind. The stone became a large mountain that filled the whole earth (v. 35).

The interpretation is introduced by a establishing a connection between the king and the God of Daniel. Daniel acknowledged the king of Babylon as a king of kings (v. 37) but stated that he was expected to function as the representative of God, who is indeed the King of kings (cf. Rev. 19:16). It was the Lord who entrusted to Nebuchadnezzar kingly dominion, power, strength, glory, and his rule over nature and humans (Dan. 2:37–38). The language is similar to Genesis 1:28, with the exception that God did not give to Adam and Eve dominion over other human beings. But the point is that the king was to function under God. Daniel's God ruled above the king.

The head of gold as a symbol represented the king of Babylon and his kingdom (Dan. 2:38). The king was concerned about his kingdom and its future, and Daniel told him that his kingdom would be succeeded by another, represented by silver and inferior to his—stronger but less magnificent. A third kingdom of bronze would arise, to be followed by a fourth kingdom of iron (vv. 39–40). The mixture of clay and iron of the feet meant that the last kingdom would be divided (vv. 41–43). The stone was a symbol of the kingdom of God that would never be destroyed and that would remain forever (v. 44). This fifth kingdom would bring to an end all the kingdoms of the earth. Intriguingly, stone imagery denoting divine action and power is known in Mesopotamian religious literature. In order to effectively communicate with the Babylonian king, God used familiar imagery that was able to connect to Nebuchadnezzar's heart and head.

This prophetic dream represents an outline of the history of human kingdoms and was fulfilled as predicted. The kingdoms that followed the Babylonian Empire (605–538 B.C.), in the order announced, were Medo-Persia (538–332 B.C.), Greece (332–168 B.C.), and Rome (168 B.C.–A.D. 476). The kingdoms that came out of the division of the Roman Empire have never reunited into a single empire. They tried to unite by marriages between the different ruling houses of Europe, but these alliances never lasted. The European nations and the whole world have been a dramatic spectacle of divisiveness and conflicts between the weak (clay) and the strong (iron).

That the stone must symbolize the Second and not the First Advent becomes clear when we remember (a) that the stone struck the image on the feet of iron and clay, indicating that it came after the Roman Empire had been divided, not when it was united; (b) that the shattering of the image suggests a world-shaking catastrophe rather than an obscure event almost unnoticed by the world; and (c) that if the First Advent is meant, the stone kingdom had been running concurrently with the iron-leg and the feet-and-toe powers for two thousand years. The vision represented the stone destroying all the preceding kingdoms and replacing them, not coexisting with them.

This dream and its interpretation provide an excellent introduction to the nature of apocalyptic prophecy. This type of prophecy provides an outline of history usually beginning at the time of the prophet and running up to the establishment of God's eternal kingdom. Apocalyptic prophecy provides hope for those who wait on the Lord in the midst of a world fragmented by sin. But in a very particular way, apocalyptic prophecy is about God's sovereignty that assures us that love and justice will finally prevail. The fulfillment of the prophecy of Daniel 2 alone is sufficient to demonstrate the inspiration of the Bible.

2:46–49. Nebuchadnezzar and God's Kingdom. The reaction of the king was the reaction of a person who had seen the greatness and majesty of the God of Daniel. He honored the prophet by prostrating before him and ordering that an offering and incense be presented to him (v. 46). This is close to an act of worship, but the fact that Nebuchadnezzar immediately acknowledges the superiority of the God of Daniel indicates that this was not an act of worship directed to Daniel but to his God. The king was not accepting the God of Daniel as the only God but as the God of gods, the Lord of kings, and the Revealer of secrets and mysteries (v. 47). He is superior to all other gods and rules over all kings. God used this incident to locate Daniel in a social position where he could be more useful to Him as His servant. He was placed in charge of Babylon and over all its wise men (v. 48). The prophet did not forget his three companions who went seeking wisdom together with him in prayer to the Lord and whose prayers He answered. They were delivered from death through divine wisdom. The connection with Jesus, who is the wisdom of God (1 Cor. 1:24), is appropriate. He is the One who delivers humans from death by giving His life for them (Mark 10:45). This is divine wisdom and the mystery of all mysteries.

3:1–30

THE IMAGE OF GOLD AND TRUE WORSHIP

Daniel 3 reveals the unwillingness of the king to accept God's plan for him and his kingdom. The idea that his kingdom would be followed by another made Nebuchadnezzar unhappy. He sought to alter the divine revelation to fit his own desires. In the process the king transformed the issue into one of loyalty to him and his kingdom by forcing everyone to worship his image. Daniel 3 is about false and true worship. It describes the call to worship (vv. 1–7), the challenge to the king's command (vv. 8–18), the divine deliverance (vv. 19–25), and the king's reaction (vv. 26–30).

3:1–7. Call to Worship. The question remains the same: Who is in control of history? The king was unwilling to accept that the One who has ultimate control of history was the God of Daniel. He preferred to believe that his kingdom would remain forever, applying to himself and to his kingdom the attributes of the kingdom of God. He decided to make this clear by building a colossal image of gold.

The dream image's head of gold, representing Nebuchadnezzar, now became the whole colossal image. The king anticipated the failure of the prophetic dream. What was needed to avoid the collapse of the kingdom was the absolute loyalty of those in administrative positions throughout the kingdom. The king ordered all of them to be present at the dedication of the image (v. 2).

The ceremony was not only a political one but also a religious one. At the appropriate moment, all of those standing before the image were to fall down and worship it (v. 5). The rejection of the divine plan for the human race leads to idolatry. But this was compulsory idolatry imposed through absolute royal power. The matter was so serious for the king that whoever would not fall down and worship would be cast into a furnace of blazing fire (v. 6). He, not God, seemed to have had the power to determine who would live or die. The oppressive power of the state made no allowance for dissenting minorities.

3:8–18. The King Is Challenged. On the plain of Dura (v. 1), a battle was to be fought between false and true worship. While there may have been other Hebrews in the crowd, only Daniel's friends were reported to the king for their refusal to serve the king's gods or worship the golden image (v. 12). The word "worship" indicates that true religion springs from the awareness that God is worthy to be revered. This event on the plain of Dura is a particularly notorious example, among others from the ANE and throughout history, of a government attempting to achieve conformity through a particular worship ritual. King Nebuchadnezzar attempted to enforce uniformity of worship by threatening a death decree to be administered to those who refused to worship his golden image.

In comparing Daniel 3 with Revelation 13:11–18, we notice several important parallels: (1) in both chapters the issue is worship—in Daniel 3 the people involved were only those living in the Babylonian Empire, while in Revelation 13 we are told of a universal test over worship at the climax of history; (2) in both chapters an image appears to be worshiped—one a literal image, the other a spiritual image; (3) in Daniel 3 the king of literal Babylon demanded this worship, while in John's prophetic vision in Revelation 13 spiritual Babylon requires the worship of the image to the beast; (4) the three Hebrews faced a death penalty—in the future, church and state will unite to enforce uniformity of worship, and those who refuse to conform will face economic boycotts and ultimately the death penalty; and (5) in both chapters the number six, as a symbol of humans under the control of evil powers, is prominent. Human beings and "the serpent" were created on the sixth day, and in Revelation 13:18 that number is associated with satanic opposition to God. In the time of Daniel, the people in Babylon were to worship the golden image. This is mentioned six times (Dan. 3:5, 7, 10, 12, 14–15, 18). In the book of Revelation, the warning against worshiping the beast and his image is also given six times (Rev. 13:15; 14:9, 11; 16:2; 19:20; 20:4).

Following the three Hebrews' refusal to bow down to his image, King Nebuchadnezzar threw down the gauntlet and rhetorically asked which god could deliver them from his power—in other words, there was none (Dan. 3:15). The three young men knew the options very well. They knew that the God whom they served was able to deliver them from the fire (v. 17). But they also knew that sometimes God, in His wisdom and love for us, does not deliver His servants from the burning fire. Their loyalty to Him was not determined by selfish concerns but by a love that was strong enough to sustain them when facing death. When the three young men were thrown into the oven, dressed in all their regalia and with their hands tied, the heat was so intense that the flames killed the soldiers who threw them in (v. 22). This incident indicates that only the God of the young men could deliver them from certain death.

As the king watched closely, he was astonished at the fact that the three Israelites were walking around in the fire with their hands loose (v. 25). The ropes used to tie their hands had burned, but not their flesh. But what really surprised the king was that instead of three there were four men inside the furnace and that the form of the fourth was like the Son of God (v. 25), meaning a divine being—in other words, the preincarnate Christ (PK 508–9). Some translations have "son of the gods" instead, most likely to indicate that Nebuchadnezzar might not have fully understood that this figure was the unique Son of God. Perhaps he considered him to be a majestic supernatural being related to the gods. Fire is associated in many cases in the Bible with the presence or apparition of God (e.g., Ex. 19:18; Deut. 4:11–12). In this case, the fire prepared by the king to destroy God's servants became the fire that accompanied the saving presence of God among mortals. The young Israelites had a private audience with their God, and the king was allowed to witness it.

3:26–30. The King's Reaction. Realizing that the fire did not do any damage to the three men, the king answered his own sarcastic question (v. 15) by stating that their God had saved His servants who trusted in Him (v. 28). The mighty act of God on behalf of His servants was so impressive that the king immediately reacted to it. First, he extolled the God of Israel because He frustrated his own plans as king of Babylon against God's servants. In other words, he recognized that this God was more powerful and majestic than he was. In the presence of the God of heaven, who manifested Himself in the fire of the furnace, the king could only raise his voice in praise. He called the God of the three Hebrews "the Most High God" (v. 26). This is a title applied to God in order to emphasize His supremacy and is used several times in Daniel 4 and 7. Second, the king made a decree in the form of a threat against any person throughout the kingdom who would dare to say anything against the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego (v. 29). To speak against God meant to show disrespect or even to blaspheme Him. The penalty would be death. Finally, the king reacted to the power of God by promoting the three Hebrews to important positions within the province of Babylon (v. 30). Their loyalty and commitment to the Lord were rewarded by Him in order to make them even more effective in His service.

4:1–37

CONVERSION OF NEBUCHADNEZZAR

After his introduction (vv. 1–3), the king continued by telling his experience of a dream (vv. 4–9) and its content (vv. 10–17). This is followed by Daniel's interpretation of the dream (vv. 18–27), its fulfillment (vv. 28–33), the restoration of the king (vv. 34–36), and a conclusion (v. 37). The central topic of the chapter is God's universal dominion over the dominion of earthly kings. True kingly human dominion is only meaningful in submission to the God of heaven.

4:1–3. Introduction. The format is that of a royal letter to be sent to the nations that constituted the Babylonian Empire (cf. Ezra 7:11–13). The king wanted everybody to know about his experience with the Most High God. The language used emphasizes the universality of the proclamation (see Rev. 14:6). He was witnessing on behalf of the God of Israel. In fact, that was the purpose of the letter: God had performed miracles of signs and wonders for him, and this had led the king to recognize and proclaim that God's kingdom is everlasting and His dominion is from generation to generation (Dan. 4:3). The signs and wonders God performed were rejected by Pharaoh but not by Nebuchadnezzar. The eternal dominion of God's heavenly kingdom was already a reality and would be fully manifested in the future among the kingdoms of the earth (Dan. 2, 7).

4:4–9. The King's Dream. The king provided the setting within which he experienced the wonders of the Most High. He was in the palace, enjoying the benefits of national peace. In the absence of war, he was interested in developing, strengthening, and beautifying the city of Babylon. It was in this setting of peace that the king had a dream that made him afraid and unsettled (v. 5). His inner peace was gone, and he could only think about this dream. This time, in contrast to the earlier dream (Dan. 2), Nebuchadnezzar remembered every detail of it and expected his wise men to interpret it for him. Once more human wisdom was unable to provide the interpretation. Finally, Daniel was summoned before the king to interpret the dream.

4:10–18. Content of the Dream. The dream was indeed very strange. The king saw a very high tree in the middle of the earth, reaching to the heavens and visible from the extremes of the earth. It was a beautiful and fruitful tree that provided food for all and shade to the animals. This was a cosmic tree, which was a common idea in the mythology of the ANE. The cosmic tree integrated the cosmos by bringing together the heavenly and the earthly realms of creation. Life flowed from it to all living creatures. The reference to its height reaching the sky (v. 11) reminds us of the Tower of Babel (Gen. 11:4), which was a symbol of human pride, arrogance, and ambition.

In the dream the king saw a heavenly being, an angel called a holy watcher or messenger, descending directly from heaven with an urgent message of judgment against the tree. The cosmic tree would be chopped down. Only a stump with a band of iron and bronze would be left.

There is some evidence for an ancient custom of putting metal bands on trees, whether to prevent them from cracking or for some other undetermined reason. Tree stumps with bands of metal have been found at Khorsabad and on cylinder seals from the palace of Ashurnasirpal (885–860 B.C.) at Nimrud.

The images used change rather quickly from the tree stump to a human being grazing among the animals of the earth (Dan. 4:15). The heart of the human being was to be changed to the heart of an animal. This mental condition would last for “seven times” (v. 16) or seven years. The reasons we do not apply the year-day principle to this time period are that (1) this is primarily a historic and not a prophetic chapter and (2) it is a period of judgment restricted to King Nebuchadnezzar.

The purpose of this judgment was to make clear to humans that the Lord rules over all the kingdoms of the earth (v. 17). The final authority in human affairs is found in God and not in political and religious institutions of human origin. There is a proper place for an earthly kingdom as long as it recognizes that God’s kingdom is above all others. He gives the earthly kingdom to whomever He wants.

4:19–27. Daniel Interprets the Dream. It appears that the interpretation of the dream was given to Daniel as he was listening to the king. For a moment he was disturbed (v. 19). One of the Aramaic words used here means “to be devastated.” This suggests that he respected and appreciated the king. Daniel was perhaps troubled because he could not anticipate the reaction of the king to what Daniel had to tell him. The king, sensing the emotional state of Daniel, encouraged him to speak. The prophet cautiously began to tell the king the interpretation of the dream, starting with the graceful and diplomatic wish that the import of the dream would not apply to the king but to his enemies.

The tree represented the king, not his kingdom. It illustrated the human achievements of the king who, like the tree, had become strong. His greatness reached to heaven/the sky and his dominion to the farthest parts of the earth (vv. 21–22). But like the tree, the king would lose all of his greatness and would be deprived of social interaction. For seven years he would dwell among the beasts of the field, eating grass and without shelter (v. 25). Some scholars have identified this type of behavior with a mental disease that used to be called lycanthropy (Gr. lukos, “wolf,” and anthrōpos, “human being,” a person behaving like an animal or a wolf). The emphasis of the text is not on natural causation but on direct divine intervention. Although the greatness of the king would be removed from him, his kingdom would be preserved—the stump and the roots were to be left in place. There was hope for him. The dream was not about the collapse of the Babylonian kingdom (v. 26).

Daniel informed the king of a divine purpose in the experience he would go through. He had infringed on the realm of God, and this needed to be redressed. It was important for the king to understand that the Most High is the Sovereign Ruler of all human kingdoms and that He gives them to whomever He chooses (v. 25). Nebuchadnezzar had to acknowledge that Heaven rules (v. 26). This may be the first time in the Bible where the term “Heaven” stands for “God.” There are limits to human power, particularly in cases when it expresses itself through human kingship. Human pride should never attempt to usurp divine sovereignty. Daniel concluded his speech with personal advice to the king. If the king ruled with justice and mercy, his prosperity would perhaps continue (v. 27). Daniel’s counsel indicated that the king still had a chance to avert the necessity of learning the hard way. It was a call to repentance, to accept his role within the divine plan.

4:28–37. Fulfillment of the Dream. The Lord gave the king a year to reflect on the dream and on Daniel’s advice to him. While walking about the royal palace, his pride reached up to heaven—he claimed to be able to rule over the earth by himself, in total independence from God. He ascribed to himself might, power, honor, and glory, based on his achievements (v. 30). What was left for him was a divine judgment that would reveal to him his true condition. Instead of greatness, the king had reached the level of irrational animals, and God would actually bring him down to that level. By his actions the king sealed his fate, and the heavenly messenger announced it to him. Once more it was revealed to the king that judgment aims at salvation. This happened in order for him to know that the Most High rules over earthly kingdoms. This would not be an arbitrary divine action but rather something intended for the good of the king.

At the end of the seven years, Nebuchadnezzar looked toward heaven, and his mental state was restored (v. 34). This was not a mere look to the heavens but a look that acknowledged the supremacy of the God of heaven and a willingness to be part of His plan for the king. This was a fundamental act of humility and dependence on God (cf. Ps. 123:1–2). His first recorded action was to praise and honor the Most High (Dan. 4:34) because only His dominion and kingdom are truly everlasting (v. 35). Compared to Him, said the king, humans are reputed as nothing and are unable to restrain His hand. No one could call Him to account. But this confession does not mean that humans could not enjoy success, splendor, and honor. Once the king found his place within the divine plan and will for him, he was restored to even higher greatness (v. 36). He concluded his royal missive not only praising God, the King of heaven, but confessing that He could humble those who live (lit. “walk”) in pride (v. 37).

This is one of the most remarkable stories in the Bible. It is a public confession by one of the greatest kings of ancient times, telling of his arrogance, humiliation, and eventual conversion to the God of heaven. Nebuchadnezzar’s life prior to this event was one long success story. By military might he had subdued all the surrounding nations. At his feet bowed the representatives of all nations. But at the height of his power, God brought him low. It is a story of warning to us all. If we make our happiness depend on anything less than heaven, we invite failure.

With this chapter Daniel brings to a close the involvement of Nebuchadnezzar in the affairs of Babylon. The existing Mesopotamian records do not provide detailed information about his death. His conversion and public proclamation of his acceptance of the authority of God was the last act of his life recorded in Scripture. “The once proud monarch had become a humble child of God” (PK 521). After a long reign, he died clearly blessed and full of glory. None of those who succeeded him on the throne were able to maintain the golden glory, much less follow the example of repentance and surrender to the Almighty. The principle that Nebuchadnezzar took a long time to learn is still valid today—God is in control of this universe and has assigned to each individual a place and a task in His great plan.

5:1–31

THE WRITING ON THE WALL

The events in Daniel 5 took place on the night of the fall of Babylon in 539 B.C. Daniel at that time had been in Babylon for more than sixty years and was an old man. A thousand guests were in a great banquet hall. While the king and his guests drank from containers from the temple in Jerusalem (v. 2), a divine hand wrote on the wall. The king was terrified and called for the wise men, but they were unable to decipher the writing. Finally, the queen mother reminded the king about Daniel (vv. 10–12). The aged prophet proclaimed God’s judgment to the king (vv. 25–28). The epilogue simply states that during that very night God’s judgment was carried out.

5:1–12. Belshazzar’s Feast. In the ten years that followed the death of Nebuchadnezzar in 562 B.C., four different rulers ascended the throne of Babylon in quick succession. The fourth, Nabonidus, a prince from Haran who had served Nebuchadnezzar as a diplomatic officer, married his daughter Nitocris. Around 550 B.C., while campaigning in the Holy Land, Nabonidus fell ill and went to Lebanon to recuperate. He summoned his son Belshazzar and entrusted the kingship to him; in other words, Nabonidus made him coregent to safeguard the perpetuity of his royal house. After recovering from his illness, Nabonidus began an invasion of northwestern Arabia where he conquered the oasis of Tema, which was to become his residency and where he built large palaces. He stayed there until 539 B.C. while his son Belshazzar reigned in Babylon as its king. Until 1854, critics claimed Belshazzar was an invention of the biblical author because ancient sources available at that time reported that Nabonidus was the last king of Babylon and made no mention of Belshazzar. Then in 1854 the first cuneiform cylinder with Belshazzar’s name was found in the city of Ur. In 1882 the Nabonidus Chronicles, which state that Nabonidus lived in Tema for several years while his son Belshazzar was ruling in Babylon, were translated.

In 539 B.C. Cyrus captured Babylon without a fight. According to the Babylonian Chronicles, Nabonidus fled south prior to the attack, while Belshazzar, who had stayed in Babylon, remained there, trusting in the city’s strong fortifications. It was here that, in a spirit of pride and arrogance, he spent his last evening with his friends in frivolous drinking, using the sacred drinking containers of Solomon’s temple. Then the fingers of a human hand appeared on the wall (v. 5). Instantly, the laughter, singing, and merrymaking stopped, and a stunned and petrified silence filled the room. The night of revelry became a night of revelation. The biblical text notes that four things happened to Belshazzar: (1) a recognizable change came over his face; (2) courage left him; (3) he lost strength in his legs/bowels (a description of incontinence); and (4) his knees knocked together (v. 6). In one brief moment, the boastful king became a shivering, shaking, and hopeless mortal. God is deadly serious when it comes to holy things. Belshazzar wantonly profaned the sacred drinking containers from the temple of Jerusalem, and he died by the end of the day. What God has declared holy (including the Sabbath or His tithe) should be treated with reverence and care.

The inscription was probably in Aramaic, which like Hebrew is written only in consonants, and it was so short that although they may have understood the individual words, they did not grasp the overall message. The queen mother referred to Nebuchadnezzar as Belshazzar's "father," but as already stated, according to the ancient sources, Nabonidus was the father of Belshazzar. The word "father" in Semitic languages, to which Hebrew and Aramaic belong, can also mean grandfather, ancestor, or even unrelated predecessor. There are no known terms for "grandfather" or "ancestor" in these languages.

5:13-31. The Fall of Babylon. Before Daniel read and interpreted the writing, he reviewed the experience of the king's grandfather, who was humbled by the Lord as a result of his refusal to heed God's warnings. Belshazzar was acquainted with these experiences, but he had chosen to ignore them. Daniel told Belshazzar that he had learned nothing from his grandfather's experiences and that he had now lifted himself up against the Lord of heaven by bringing the vessels of the temple in Jerusalem into the banqueting hall.

Then Daniel proceeded to read the inscription. In Aramaic the inscription consisted of four words. How they were to be read depended on what vowels were supplied. Daniel read them out as mene', mene', teqel, (u)parsin and then gave the interpretation. The interpretation spelled imminent doom for Belshazzar. A few hours later, the Persians under Gobryas (probably the biblical Darius the Mede, one of Cyrus's generals) entered the city and slew Belshazzar (v. 30). Gobryas established order in the city and won the people's goodwill by his respect for their temples.

How were the Persians able to penetrate the seemingly impregnable defenses of the city? The Greek historian Herodotus reports that the Medes and the Persians turned the Euphrates out of its channel and were able to march into the heart of the city through it. The Babylonians did not expect their city to fall. They thought they were safe behind its mighty walls, but there is no real peace in human achievements (cf. 1 Thess. 5:3).

Cyrus appears in Isaiah 45:1 as a type of Jesus the Messiah. As Cyrus came from the east (41:2, 25; 46:11) to overthrow ancient Babylon and deliver Israel from the Babylonian captivity, so Christ would come from the east to deliver His people from end-time Babylon at the battle of Armageddon (Rev. 16:12-16). As God's people of old left Babylon to return to Jerusalem, so God's people will leave this earthly, spiritual Babylon (18:1-4) to enter the new Jerusalem (21:2).

6:1-28

THE DELIVERANCE OF DANIEL AND DARIUS

Daniel 6 is the last historical chapter in the book. Although he was now more than eighty years of age, Daniel was placed in charge of the government of Babylon by the Persians, the conquerors of the Babylonian Empire. But this aroused the jealousy of his colleagues. They managed to deceive the king, and Daniel ended up in the lions' den, but God delivered him, and in the end the king honored God.

6:1-9. Plot against Daniel. The term "satrap" means "protector of the kingdom." According to Xenophon and other Greek historians, it referred to any rank of subordinate officials in the kingdom and should not be confused with the geographic regions of the kingdom called satrapies. According to Herodotus, the Medo-Persian Empire was divided into twenty satrapies. Since Darius the Mede in Daniel 6 ruled only over the kingdom of Babylon, the 120 satraps most likely were royal officials who ruled over smaller divisions within his realm.

Under Darius the Mede, Daniel was recalled from retirement and became one of the three chief officials. As such he had supervisory powers over all the provincial governors. The king undoubtedly acted in the best interests of the state in elevating Daniel to the highest civil office, but he failed to take into account the feelings of jealousy among his top officials. To place a Jew, a former prime minister of the defeated Babylonians, in such a high position was too much for the other officers. These politicians, therefore, ordered their legal sleuths to "dig for dirt" in Daniel's character, but they could not find any skeletons in his closet because he was loyal to the king (v. 4). Digging up dirt and slandering the other contenders has obviously been a favored method since ancient times to bring down the opposition.

Daniel's "colleagues" managed to persuade the king to make a firm decree that his people must pray for one month to no one but the king. Though in this instance aimed at Daniel, it may have been suggested by a national custom of earlier times among the Medes, according to which special honors were rendered to the king.

6:10-17. Daniel in the Lions' Den. In spite of the decree, Daniel went home and did what he was used to doing; he prayed three times to his God. Daniel neither left on pretended business nor said his prayers in secret. To rationalize such compromises to preserve his life and his position would have been easy, but he refused to compromise. Knowing very well what was going on, he was willing to risk his life to honor God, trusting his Lord to deliver him if He saw fit. Like Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, he chose loyalty to God over obedience to a pagan government.

Daniel's house would have been the normal flat-topped dwelling, with a room built on the roof that had large latticed windows to allow free circulation of air. The custom of turning toward Jerusalem when praying is based on Solomon's prayer (1 Kin. 8:35) and is still practiced by many Jews today. Eliezer and Solomon stood when praying (Gen. 24:12-14; 1 Kin. 8:22-23). Daniel, like Ezra (Ezra 9:5), Jesus (Luke 22:41), Stephen (Acts 7:60), and Paul (Eph. 3:14), used the more customary position of kneeling.

The king soon realized that his own officials had led him into a trap to get rid of Daniel, and Darius was greatly upset. Although he did his best to save Daniel from the den of lions to which Darius had unwittingly condemned him, Darius was unable to change the law of the Medes and Persians. At sunset he was forced to execute the sentence. What a long night he must have spent with a bad conscience!

The den of lions was probably an underground pit with perpendicular walls and an opening at the top. The condemned were lowered or thrown into it from above. In this particular case, a large stone was rolled over the opening and was sealed with the king's signet ring and that of his nobles. The seal was a guarantee to Daniel's enemies that no attempt would be made to save him but also to the king that Daniel would not be harmed in any way if, as the king hoped, the God of Daniel should preserve him from the lions.

6:18-28. Daniel Saved and Darius's Response.

As soon as the morning dawned, the king hastened to the lions' den. He called to Daniel and asked him whether his God had been able to deliver him (v. 20). Yes, God is able to deliver, but whether He does or not must be left in His hands. He did not deliver Daniel from being thrown alive into the den of lions, and neither did He deliver John the Baptist. Through the ages many martyrs who perished were comforted as they recalled that Christ Himself had been permitted to suffer.

In throwing the accusers with their wives and children into the den of lions (v. 24), the king acted in the fashion typical of the despots of his day. Herodotus testifies that consigning to death whole families along with condemned men was in accordance with Persian custom. Darius then sent out a letter in different languages across his kingdom (cf. 4:1). He commanded his people to fear and revere the God of Daniel, the living God who performed a miracle in delivering Daniel from the lions (6:26). The chapter concludes with the statement that Daniel prospered in the reigns of Darius and Cyrus (v. 28). Daniel prospered because he could give thanks to God although facing the lion's den (v. 10); he believed in prayer. He was faithful in his work and refused to do evil. Neither rank nor wealth could sway him from his faithfulness to God (2:48; 5:29; 6:3).

7:1-28

THE KINGDOM OF GOD

Daniel 7 is the last chapter written in Aramaic. This links it with the preceding chapters, while the vision of the four beasts connects it with the later chapters. It is largely parallel to the vision of the image given to King Nebuchadnezzar in chapter 2, but from here on we have the record of Daniel as the recipient of the visions and their interpretations. There are some differences between both chapters. Daniel 2 provides a general survey of the future from Nebuchadnezzar's days until the Second Advent, while Daniel 7 focuses on the time period between the end of the fourth empire and the Second Advent. Daniel 2 portrays the worldly empires from a political perspective, but Daniel 7 includes the military struggles, through the symbol of wild animals, and also the spiritual conflict, through the symbol of the little horn. Daniel 7 shows that between the fourth empire and the Second Advent, symbolized by the falling stone in Daniel 2, a religiopolitical power would grow from small beginnings to great dominion.

7:1-8. Vision of the Beasts and the Little Horn. In 550 B.C., during the first year of Belshazzar (v. 1), or about fifty years after the vision of chapter 2, Daniel saw that the four winds of heaven were breaking out upon the Great Sea, from which four beasts arose. These symbols were familiar to the prophet. In Scripture, winds represent storms of war and conquest (Jer. 25:31-33; 49:36-37; Zech. 7:14; Rev. 7:1). Flooding rivers symbolize the movements of invading armies (e.g., Is. 8:7-8; Jer. 46:6-8; Amos 8:8). According to Daniel 7:17, the four beasts represent four kings or kingdoms that would be or exist upon the earth (v. 23). In both the Scriptures and popular symbolism of ancient and modern times, wild animals are a familiar symbol for nations and empires. The symbolism of beasts that rise from a wind-torn sea points to political wars and conquests. Three of the kingdoms are identified in Daniel as the Babylonian (2:38), the Medo-Persian (5:28, 30), and the Greek (8:20-21). The fourth one was identified by Jesus as Rome (Matt. 24:15-16).

The first beast, a lion (Dan. 7:4), was a particularly appropriate symbol for Babylon. Representations of lions have been found on the walls of the great Babylonian processional way to the Ishtar Gate and on the gate itself. That its wings were taken off indicates that after Nebuchadnezzar's completion of his immense program of conquest and reconstruction, his successors settled down, in the way so typical of human complacency, to enjoy the wealth and luxury they had inherited. The second beast, a lopsided bear that was crunching three ribs, represents the empire of Medo-Persia and its conquest of Lydia (547 B.C.), Babylon (539 B.C.), and Egypt (525 B.C.) under the leadership of Cyrus and Cambyses. The third beast, a leopard, is noted for the swiftness and the agility of its movements. The four wings are a fitting symbol for the speed of movement that was characteristic of the young Alexander the Great, who set out in 334 B.C. with thirty-five thousand men and who, in ten years, established the greatest and most influential empire the world had known up to that time.

In vision, Daniel saw that the empire of Greece would be divided into four kingdoms, and this is exactly what occurred. When Alexander died, a power struggle among his generals led to the division of the empire into four kingdoms: Seleucus controlled Syria and the East all the way to India; western Asia Minor and Thrace fell to Lysimachus; Ptolemy became king of Egypt; and Cassander, already governor of Macedon, was now recognized as the sovereign of Greece. In this way they created a new political map of the Near East that was to last until the Romans conquered the whole ANE.

Based on the clear parallel structure of the visions between Daniel 2 and 7, the fourth beast, the animal with iron teeth (v. 7), appears here as evidently the counterpart of the iron legs and feet of the image in Daniel 2. By A.D. 200 it was commonly recognized among the church fathers that the fourth kingdom was Rome. World power may be said to have passed from the Greeks to the Romans at the Battle of Pydna in 168 B.C., when the Roman general Paullus won a decisive victory over Perseus of Macedonia. By 146 B.C. Macedonia was a Roman province, and in 63 B.C. Syria and Judea became Roman provinces. During the next few decades, Roman legions marched westward and conquered the countries that were to become Spain, France, and England. Finally, in 30 B.C. Egypt, the last of the great Hellenistic kingdoms, was annexed as a province, and all the then-known world was united under one government, speaking Greek in the east and Latin in the west. Notice that the Roman Empire is described as different from all the previous kingdoms (7:7, 19) and that it would do what the others could not do, namely, "devour the whole earth" (v. 23). It was to transcend geographical boundaries and become a universal phenomenon.

The ten horns (v. 24) are not treated independently from the beast but are seen as a continuation of its activities. The horns correspond to the feet and toes of the image and represent the nations that would arise from the ruins of the Roman Empire and would maintain Roman civilization to a large extent. Some interpreters have identified the ten horns as ten tribes and the European kingdoms descending from them (e.g., Vandals, Visigoths, Sueves, Anglo-Saxons, Franks, Alemannians, Burgundians, Lombards, Ostrogoths, and Heruls). Others have argued that it is best to take the number ten as a round figure (e.g., Gen. 31:7; Num. 14:22; 1 Sam. 1:8) representing a multiplicity of states in contrast to the one empire of Rome.

Among the ten horns, another horn, a small one, emerged (Dan. 7:8). Though small at the beginning, this little horn is later described as more significant than the other ones (v. 20).

Critical scholars, as well as some conservative Bible interpreters, identify the little horn in Daniel 7 and 8 as the Syrian king Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–164 B.C.). This interpretation goes back to the Neoplatonic philosopher Porphyry (A.D. 232–305), who wrote fifteen books attacking Christianity. In one of them, he claimed that the book of Daniel was written in the second century B.C. and that the little horn is the Syrian king Antiochus IV (see “The Little Horn and Antiochus IV,” p. 1039). Today, most conservative interpreters are futurists and see the little horn as a symbol of a yet future end-time antichrist or argue that the symbol has a dual application to Antiochus and the antichrist. Seventh-day Adventists, who champion historicism, agree with those church historians who believe that the only power in history that fits the description of the little horn is Christian Rome and that the three uprooted horns were Arian kingdoms (see “The Union of Church and State,” p. 1033).

7:9–14. Vision of the Ancient of Days, the Beast, and the Son of Man. This passage presents three scenes: (a) a judgment in heaven (vv. 9–10); (b) an announcement of the end of the fourth beast (vv. 11–12); and (c) Christ receiving the kingdom (vv. 13–14). The whole picture is one of overwhelming grandeur, with God, the Ancient of Days, as supreme judge, seated on His throne in the heavenly court surrounded by myriads of angels. The prophet saw the Ancient of Days (v. 9), literally “one advanced in days,” a symbolic description of God the Father as a wise judge, moving to where the judgment would take place. His movable throne was like a chariot of fiery flames, with wheels of burning fire, similar to the movable sapphire throne Ezekiel saw in vision (Ezek. 1). The emphasis is on the brightness of the throne.

In the vision Daniel saw that books were opened (Dan. 7:10). In Scripture the heavenly books are a record of human deeds, experiences, and words, and they are used in a judgment setting to provide objective evidence supporting the pronouncement of a just verdict. In the biblical concept, the judgment includes an examination or investigation of the information found in the books. The Bible mentions the Book of Life (or “the living”; Ps. 69:28; cf. Phil. 4:3) and the scroll or book “of remembrance” (Mal. 3:16), and John not only mentions the Book of Life but also other books (Rev. 20:12), perhaps the same as those mentioned in Daniel 7:10. The Book of Life contains the names of those who place their faith in God (Dan. 12:1; Heb. 12:23; Rev. 17:8; 21:27) or of those who have entered the service of God. One of the purposes of the judgment is to publicly show whether a person has remained faithful to his or her commitment to God. The judgment described in Daniel is of cosmic proportions and takes place before the heavenly family (see “The Cleansing of the Sanctuary and Judgment in Daniel,” p. 1043).

In the vision the judgment scene was interrupted by the proud (lit. “great”) words uttered by the little horn (7:11), but when Daniel turned, he saw the ultimate destruction of the beast whose body was burnt because of its unfaithfulness (cf. Lev. 20:14; 21:9; Josh. 7:15; Rev. 17:16; 18:8). This executive judgment against the beast was to occur at the eschatological end and not at the time of the collapse of the pagan Roman Empire. The beast was to remain alive through the period of the ten horns, into which it was divided, and particularly through the period of the little horn itself (Dan. 7:25–26).

Verse 12 functions as a parenthesis that reflects on the fact that the first three beast-kingdoms, although deprived of their authority, were allowed to live for a period of time. Babylon was conquered by Persia in 539 B.C., but the city continued to exist for centuries. Greece and Persia still exist today but not with the power and glory they had in OT times. Thus, each of these powers lived on after its dominion was taken away. Elements of those ancient cultures have impacted the Western world.

In the judgment scene (vv. 13–14), Daniel saw One like the Son of Man or a humanlike being coming to the courtroom (v. 13). “Son of Man” was Jesus’s favorite title for Himself (e.g., Matt. 8:20; 10:23), and it is one that can be viewed as emphasizing His connection with humanity. At the same time, it was a messianic title, based on this text in Daniel (26:63–64). Some have assumed that coming with the clouds must refer to the Second Coming of Jesus, and in fact there are passages which associate the clouds of heaven with the Second Coming of Christ (24:30; 26:64; Rev. 1:7). But in Daniel 7 this interpretation is not possible because in the vision the Ancient of Days was not on this earth but in heaven. The text says that He went before the Ancient of Days. Both of them move from one place to another—as the high priest did during the Day of Atonement. In fact, the imagery used in the vision is that of the high priest approaching God covered by a cloud of incense during the Day of Atonement—a day of judgment (see “The Theology of the Day of

The Union of Church and State

The apostles hardly could have imagined that the time would come when the church would move from the fringes of the Roman Empire to its very center of power. In fact, the church received civil power in almost unexpected ways and soon began to use it, becoming an oppressive institution. The details about how this happened are not always clear, but we have enough historical information to pinpoint the events that led to a radical transformation of the Christian church and its message.

1. Chronological Focus. As we examine the history of the first few centuries, we can identify the following events as key ones in the union of the secular and the sacred powers.

- A.D. 303 Beginning of the last and most severe persecution of Christians in the Roman Empire under Emperor Diocletian.

- A.D. 313 Edict of Milan. Christians were granted full religious freedom. This included the restoration of confiscated property to the previous owners. Only one year later, religious freedom was restricted through a decree that ordered that the returned church property must be given to the Catholic body of the Christians. From that time Constantine began to side with the Catholic faction of the Christian church.

- A.D. 314 Sylvester I was named bishop of Rome. He was crowned and clad in imperial raiment as an earthly prince. For centuries persecuted by the Roman Empire, Catholic Christianity assumed an intimate relationship with secular power and quickly grew to a position of great influence over the affairs of the empire.

- A.D. 321 Emperor Constantine issued an edict, establishing a pagan day of rest that prohibited work on “the venerable day of the sun” (Sunday), the day that has come to be substituted for the seventh-day Sabbath. (In about 364, the local Catholic Church Council of Laodicea formally prohibited the keeping of the “Jewish Sabbath” by Christians.)

- A.D. 324 The emperor formally recognized Christianity as an official religion of the empire. The previous year, Constantine defeated the eastern emperor, Licinius, and became the sole emperor of east and west. Thus, Christianity was at this time an established religion throughout the Roman world.

- A.D. 330 Emperor Constantine moved the capital of the empire to Byzantium (Constantinople). The result was that the bishop of Rome gradually filled the power vacuum left in Rome.

- A.D. 380 Emperor Theodosius I (378–395) made Catholic Christianity the official religion of the empire. In 394 he formally outlawed worshiping the ancient gods in the empire.

- A.D. 452 Attila the Hun appeared in northern Italy with a great army. The road to Rome lay open before him. Its citizens expected the worst, but Rome was spared. The bishop of Rome at this time, Leo I (440–461), traveled northward to the River Po to meet the mighty Attila. There is no record of the conversation between the two, but one fact is clear: as a fearless diplomat, Leo confronted the “Scourge of God” and won. He somehow persuaded Attila to abandon his quest for the Eternal City. Attila died shortly afterward, and the Huns troubled Europe no more.

The prestige of the medieval church was greatly enhanced by Leo’s intervention on behalf of Rome. As the civil government grew increasingly incapable of keeping order, the Catholic Church began to take its place, assuming many secular responsibilities. History records that it was Leo the Great who laid the foundations for the temporal power of the popes. Leo became the leading figure in Italy, and in the religious sphere he strongly asserted the primacy of Rome’s bishop over all other bishops. Earlier in the century, the illustrious Augustine (354–430), bishop of Hippo in North Africa, uttered the now-famous words, “roma locuta, causa finite” (“Rome has spoken, the case is closed”). At the Council of Chalcedon in 451, the assembled bishops responded to Leo’s pronouncements with the words “Peter has spoken by Leo; let him be anathema who believes otherwise.” The doctrine that papal power had been granted by Christ to Peter, and that that power was passed on by Peter to his successors in Rome, began to take firm root.

- A.D. 533 Emperor Justinian in Constantinople recognized the pope in Rome as the head of the whole church, both east and west. This was incorporated in his law code, Codex Justinianus, which ensured that Catholic Christianity was the state religion of the empire. All citizens of the empire became required to belong to the Catholic Church. Through this legislation Justinian achieved the complete union of church and state.

- A.D. 538 Belisarius, the general of the Eastern Roman emperor Justinian, delivered Rome from the siege of the Arian Ostrogoths, and the papacy was able to freely expand its power from then on. Thus, the formal appointment of the bishop of Rome as “the head of all the Holy Churches” was implemented with the liberation of Rome in 538 and the establishment of the Justinian code as the underlying philosophical and legal basis of Roman law.

2. Arian Influence. The Germanic tribes who invaded the Roman Empire were converted to the Arian form of Christianity. The Council of Nicea (325) condemned Arianism, but the movement continued to be strong in many areas of Europe. Arianism was a heresy of the fourth century A.D., named for Arius, a presbyter in Alexandria, Egypt, who denied the eternal existence of Christ and the Trinity. Arius held that Jesus was created by God as the first act of Creation. This view was condemned at the Council of Nicea in 325. However, Arianism achieved great popularity after the death of Constantine in 337 because his son and successor Constantius promoted it. The controversy came to an end at the Council of Constantinople in 381 when Arianism was again condemned.

It was probably in 508 that Clovis, pagan chieftain of the Franks who was married to a Catholic wife, converted to Roman Catholicism and was baptized (see commentary on Dan. 12:5–13). The Catholics rallied around him as the only Catholic prince in the west and assisted him in conquering the Arian princes. In turn he found it prudent to promote the church, and the Franks were called the “oldest son” of the Roman church.

Through the influence of the bishop of Rome, the emperors of the Roman Empire were instrumental in eliminating three of the ten barbarian kingdoms that had settled in the Roman Empire. In 493 the Heruli were eliminated by the Ostrogoths as one of the three “plucked out” horns. The other two Arian kingdoms were defeated by the Eastern Roman emperor Justinian’s general Belisarius: the Vandals in 533 and the Ostrogoths in 553.

3. Centralization of Power. Political foresight and shrewd diplomacy are characteristic of apostate Christianity. The removal of the capital to Constantinople in A.D. 330, and the end of the Western Empire in A.D. 476, left the bishop of Rome as the one to whom the people in the Western Empire looked in place of the emperor. Thus, the pope in Rome soon became the political, as well as the spiritual, head in the west. Three events greatly enhanced the power of the church.

The first event was the Donation of Pippin. In 756, Pippin, king of the Franks, responded to an appeal from Pope Stephen II for help against the Lombards. Pippin went to war against the Lombards, defeated them, and presented the pope with some of their conquered territory.

The second event was the purported Donation of Constantine. In the eighth century, a document appeared that claimed that Emperor Constantine (306–337) had given to the pope the city of Rome, all of Italy, and the western regions as his temporal domain and that Constantine had also given him supremacy over the four principal sees of Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Constantinople and the churches of God in the whole earth. It has been suggested that Stephen II used this document in his negotiations with Pippin to obtain the conquered Lombard territories. In 1440 Lorenzo Valla exposed the document as a fraud.

The third event was the crowning of Charlemagne by the pope. On Christmas Day A.D. 800, Pope Leo III unexpectedly placed a crown on the head of Charlemagne while the latter was kneeling before the altar of the old St. Peter’s Basilica, proclaiming him ruler of the Holy Roman Empire. The pope thereby established under his own control the so-called Holy Roman Empire, in which, for a thousand years, emperors would be presumed to rule Europe by permission of the pope. The Holy Roman Empire continued until 1806 when Napoleon forced Emperor Franz II of Austria to relinquish the title “Holy Roman Emperor.”

The power of the church reached its zenith under Gregory VII (1018–1085), who first promulgated the theory that the pope could depose kings, and under Innocent III (1198–1216), who made himself absolute sovereign over the Roman Catholic kings of the Holy Roman Empire and organized crusades against the Muslims in Spain and the Holy Land and the Albigenses or Cathars in southern France.

Atonement,” p. 264). It is in the presence of God that the Son functions as the Mediator for sinners (Dan. 12:1; Heb. 7:25), and it is there that at the eschaton the Son receives dominion, glory, and the kingdom.

7:15–28. Interpretation of the Vision. As in chapter 2, here also the symbolic revelation is followed by its interpretation. Daniel found the vision incomprehensible and sought an interpretation from the accompanying angel, who offered a brief interpretation identifying the four beasts as four kings that would arise in human history. But the only kingdom that was to last forever was the kingdom of the Most High, and it would be given to His saints. Note that the term “kings” is used throughout this section interchangeably with “kingdoms” (7:17–18, 22–23).

Daniel was particularly concerned about the fourth beast and its little horn. In a flashback, he describes again what he saw in the vision, adding a few new insights (vv. 19–22). He saw the little horn persecuting the people of God and also that the coming of the Son of Man to the Ancient of Days would initiate the judgment that resulted in the vindication of His people (v. 22). An angel said to Daniel that the judgment would result in the destruction of their enemies (v. 26). The angel proceeded to interpret the vision and informed Daniel that the beast would not be an ordinary kingdom but one intending to control the whole earth through terror and violence. The angel explained the ten horns as a symbol of the division of the kingdom and clarified the nature and work of the little horn that would last for a time, times, and half a time (see below, “The Little Horn in Daniel 7”).

The Little Horn in Daniel 7

The interpretation of the little horn is to be based on the information that the text itself provides for us and its correlation to the history of God’s people. The text informs us about its origin, its nature, and its work.

1. Its Origin. The text places the origin of the little horn at a particular chronological moment in the vision. First, it appears in history after the division of the Roman Empire, that is to say, after the ten horns/kings arise (v. 24). The Christianization of the Roman Empire prepared the way for the rise of the little horn after the fall of the kingdom. The successor of the empire was not the barbarian kingdoms but the Christian church, later to be known as the Holy Roman Empire, a kingdom without geographical boundaries. What at first may have seemed to be a good thing—the union of church and state—proved itself to be toxic to Christianity. Second, its origin is associated with the uprooting of three of the ten horns (vv. 8, 20, 24), thus confirming the fact that it was the successor of the Roman Empire. The three kingdoms that accepted an Arian understanding of the Trinity were basically exterminated (see “The Union of Church and State,” p. 1033).

2. Its Nature. The little horn is described as both different from and more significant than the others (vv. 20, 24). Compared to the other horns, this one was to have an element of uniqueness. It consolidated the remainder of pagan Rome under the Christian faith and the civil power. It was a religiopolitical entity with the power needed to violate human conscience or to persecute others. In the vision, it had eyes (vv. 8, 20), probably referring to the misuse of wisdom and insight in order to achieve its purpose. Its words were to evince arrogance, pride, and the absence of the humility that characterized the Savior (Matt. 11:29). In fact, it would speak against the Most High (Dan. 7:25). By seeking political power to promote and impose its ideas, the little horn would act against God, who has the power to lead and protect His people without human political powers. This therefore would be an arrogant religiopolitical power, identified in history as Christian Rome, which, like the kings of Israel and Judah, united with other political powers to achieve its purposes.

3. Its Work. The work of this religiopolitical power is quite clearly stated. First, it would attempt to change times and law (v. 25). The term “times” plays an important role in Daniel. God changes the “times” in the sense that He, as the Lord of history, determines when kingdoms arise and fall (2:21). He is also the One who determines the time when the saints will receive the kingdom (7:22). The fulfillment of prophecy is in His hands. The little horn, by uniting political and religious powers, would believe itself to be in control of history and the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth. It was to practically take or assume the place of God on earth. The attempt to change the law is well attested in history with the change of Sabbath to Sunday as the day of worship and rest, as well as in the modification of the second commandment regarding the worship of images. In a broader sense, the law could refer to God's instructions to His people that were preserved in the Bible. Apostate Christianity has in many ways changed, ignored, or abandoned biblical truth (cf. Acts 20:28–29).

Second, the little horn would make war against God's holy people (Dan. 7:21); that is to say, it would persecute and oppress them (v. 25). This is one of the ways in which the union of church and state was to demonstrate its power. Christianity appeals to the human conscience through the persuasive power of the word of God and the power of the Spirit without violating human freedom. When the church uses civil power to enforce its positions, it is acting against God and His people. The best example of the persecuting power of the little horn is the Inquisition. During the Middle Ages, the growing threat of heretical groups led to the acceptance of the use of secular authority and an inquisitorial method by the church as a means to suppress heretics. Part of the theological justification for this practice was based on Augustine's (A.D. 354–430) understanding of Luke 14:23, where Jesus, in the parable of the Great Supper, said, "Compel them to come in." Augustine took this as a justification for the use of force if they would not come of their own free will.

Third, the oppressive power of Christian Rome was to remain unchallenged for a time, times, and half a time (Dan. 7:25). This time period is identified in the Bible as the equivalent of 1,260 days (Rev. 12:6) or 42 months (13:5 [42 x 30 = 1,260]), indicating that the "time" is 360 days (12 months of 30 days each = 360), "times" is twice as much (24 months of 30 days each = 720 days), and "half a time" is half a year (6 months of 30 days each = 180 [360 + 720 + 180 = 1,260]). This prophetic period extends from 538 to 1798 (see "The 1,260 Days/Years," p. 1037; "The Union of Church and State," p. 1033; and "Interpreting Biblical Apocalyptic Prophecies," p. 46).

The victory of the people of God and the destruction of the beast are directly related to the heavenly court and the opening of the books. For God's people this would be a moment of paramount importance, for at that moment they would be vindicated before the universe. As a result of their vindication, the dominion of the little horn would come to an end, and it would be consumed and destroyed forever.

While the destruction of the enemy was to be eternal, the kingdom of the Most High is an everlasting kingdom entrusted to the saints through their Mediator, the Son of Man (vv. 13–14, 27). The vision was about the limited power of the earthly kingdoms that were to come to an end. They would succeed each other through violence and would even oppress the people of God in an attempt to defeat God's plan, but at the end all of them would fail, and God's love and concern for His people would prevail. This reversal of history was to be determined in the divine court of law and enforced in human history through the power of God and the Son of Man.

8:1–27

GOD'S SANCTUARY UNDER ATTACK

Daniel 7:28 concludes the Aramaic section of the book of Daniel; chapter 8 resumes in Hebrew. Even the symbols employed are different from those in the Aramaic section. No longer do we have wild beasts, but the clean sacrificial animals of the sanctuary are present. On the Day of Atonement, the ram and the goat were the burnt and sin offerings used in the cleansing ritual of the sanctuary (Lev. 16:5). Beyond representing Medo-Persia and Greece, these animals imply that this chapter is interested in the sanctuary service, specifically the Day of Atonement. This chapter contains a vision (Dan. 8:1–12), an audition (vv. 13–14), and a partial interpretation (vv. 15–27).

8:1–8. Vision of a Ram and a Goat. In this vision, which Daniel received about 548 B.C., he saw a ram that had two horns (v. 3). Daniel was specifically told that the ram represents the kings of Media and Persia (v. 20). Ancient records tell us that the king of Persia, when at the head of his army, bore in the place of a crown the head of a ram. The same figure is frequently found on Persian seals. The Persian kings established an empire that stretched from Asia Minor (Turkey) in the west to the borders of India in the east. Perhaps what is surprising in this vision is that it ignores the Babylonian Empire even though it is dated to the third year of the reign of Belshazzar. The chapter itself suggests an answer: the time period mentioned in it (the 2,300 days; v. 14) is to be counted from the beginning of the vision, that is to say, from the time of the Medo-Persian kingdom.

Next, Daniel saw a goat with a notable horn between its eyes. The interpretation identifies it as the kingdom of Greece (v. 21). Alexander the Great claimed to be the offspring of the god Jupiter Ammon, whose symbol was a goat. He established an even greater empire than that of the Persians. Alexander first drove the Persians out of Asia Minor. Following these victories, he marched his armies down through Syria, Phoenicia, and the Holy Land to Egypt, taking time to destroy the kingdoms along the way, including the great sea power of the island city of Tyre (332–331). After defeating Egypt, he turned east, subdued Babylon and Medo-Persia, and did not rest until he reached India. He marched his soldiers ten thousand miles (16,093 km) in eight years.

When Alexander returned to Babylon, he was only thirty-two years old and the world was at his feet. But in 323 B.C., at the height of his glory, he died, and thus the large horn was broken (v. 8). In its place four significant horns came up. The four horns represented in the vision the four kingdoms (v. 22) that arose from Alexander's empire (see 7:6). In his explanation Gabriel stated that these four kingdoms would not be as powerful as Alexander's kingdom (8:22).

8:9–14. The Little Horn. Next, we are told that a small horn came out of one of them (lit. "one horn came from smallness"). This new horn came forth from small beginnings and developed in various directions, gaining immense strength. Most commentators have assumed that in the prophecy's fulfillment the little horn came out of one of the four horns, in other words, out of one of the four Greek kingdoms that succeeded the kingdom of Alexander the Great. They have identified this little horn with the Syrian king Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–164 B.C.). But grammatically this is unlikely, first, because the nearest antecedent of "one of them" is the winds of heaven, not the

The 1,260 Days/Years

The time, times, and half a time mentioned in Daniel 7:25 is equivalent to 1,260 days/years (see "The Little Horn in Daniel 7," p. 1035). This period extends from A.D. 538 to 1798. In A.D. 538 Emperor Justinian recognized the bishop of Rome as head of the church of both the west and east, and in A.D. 538 General Belisarius delivered Rome from the siege of Arian Christians. Thus, the bishop of Rome as "the head of all the Holy Churches" became effective in 538 (see "The Union of Church and State," p. 1033).

On November 9, 1793, the French Revolution abolished Christianity and replaced it with the worship of reason, and on February 10, 1798, Napoleon's general Berthier entered Rome and took Pope Pius VI prisoner, ending the dominant position the church had held throughout the Middle Ages. The events that took place in 533 and 1793 prepared the way for the beginning (538) and ending (1798) of the 1,260-day prophecy.

Roman Christianity, however, began to recover after 1798, as prophecy had predicted (see Rev. 13:3). On February 11, 1929, a treaty was signed in the Lateran Palace between the See of Rome (Pope Pius XI) and the Kingdom of Italy (King Victor Emmanuel III); the Lateran Treaty, as it is known in history, was ratified on June 8 of the same year. The treaty recognized the Kingdom of Italy under the dynasty of the House of Savoy, with Rome as its capital, and Italy recognized the See of Rome, with its absolute, sole jurisdiction over the state called the Vatican, and guaranteed its freedom and independence.

four horns. Thus, from the perspective of Daniel's time, the little horn would come out from one of the four points of the compass (the winds of heaven) and grow toward other directions of the compass (east and south). Second, in the vision of Daniel 7:2, "the four winds of heaven," in conjunction with the sea, were the source from which the kingdoms arose, and from that same source the little horn originated. It designates the origin of another powerful kingdom, not the origin of an insignificant political power. Third, notice how the description of the previous kingdoms compares with that of the little horn: Medo-Persia "became great" (8:4), Greece became "very great" and strong (v. 8), and the little horn was gadal yeter (v. 9). Gadal can be translated as "to become great"/"strong" or "to grow." Yeter can mean "excess" or "preeminence." But the phrase itself should be translated as "it became great exceedingly." It underscores the little horn's greatness as superior to those of both Medo-Persia and Greece, something which is evident from its description in the rest of the chapter (e.g., it will reach up to the heavenly hosts; v. 10). The comparison and contrast in the vision is not between the four kingdoms that were to come out of Greece but with the two previous kingdoms. This is understandable because the little horn stands for the fourth beast of Daniel 7—the part (the horn) stands for the whole (the beast). The beast is not explicitly mentioned in order to emphasize the work of the horn (Christian Rome). Besides, the symbols for the kingdoms were clean animals, and the beast was anything but clean. Fourth, the Hebrew word yatza' ("set out"/"came," "go out"; v. 9) is often used in Hebrew to describe movement in reference to location (e.g., Gen. 2:10; 11:31; Ex. 16:29). It is never used to describe the growing of a horn, an activity designated by the Hebrew word 'alah ("go up," "come up") used in Daniel 8:3, 8.

Since references to the little horn in Daniel 7 and 8 come after references to Persia and Greece, it must be, as suggested, a symbol for Rome in both chapters. In Daniel 7, both the union and the distinction between pagan and Christian Rome is pointed out by their being represented separately and yet united as beast and horn. In Daniel 8, the essential unity is taken for granted, and the horn represents Rome in both its phases. Gabriel's reference to the latter period of the Grecian kingdom (v. 23) fits the gradual rise of Rome well.

The little horn, we are told, extended itself to the south, east, and the Glorious or Beautiful Land (v. 9). Rome ruled a larger territory than any of the kingdoms before it. Persia ruled from Asia Minor to India, Greece from Macedonia to India, Rome from England to Mesopotamia. Rome also ruled for a longer period than any of the kingdoms before it. Persia and Greece each ruled for about two hundred years. As a civil power, Rome ruled for six hundred years, and adding its religious form, papal Rome, has existed for more than two thousand years. Rome also had a better organized government than Persia and Greece.

Not only did the little horn become great politically, but it grew up to the host of heaven and caused some of the host and the stars to fall (v. 10). The reference to the heavenly hosts introduces a vertical shift toward heaven. According to the interpretation given to Daniel, they would be God's people on earth (v. 24) but with citizenship in heaven (Phil. 3:20; see "The Work of the Little Horn and the Prince," p. 1040). According to Revelation 1:20, stars symbolize the leaders of the church. In Daniel 8:24, the stars are called the "mighty" among God's people. When Jerusalem was destroyed by Rome in A.D. 70, more than a million Jews perished but no Christians. In the first two centuries of the Christian era, however, the emperors Nero, Decius, and Diocletian destroyed hundreds, perhaps even thousands, of Christians who refused to offer incense to the emperor.

In v. 11, the transition to the vertical plane is total. The horizontal movement serves to identify the activities of pagan Rome, but now we see the full vertical dimension. In the vision, the little horn magnified itself even as high as the Prince of the host or the Commander of the Lord's army. This suggests that now we are dealing with Christian Rome. In Joshua, the title Prince or Commander (Heb. sar) of the host of God's people is used to refer to a heavenly being later identified as the Lord Himself (Josh. 5:13–15; 6:2). In Daniel that heavenly being must be the One called Michael the prince (sar; 10:21) and Michael, the great prince (sar; 12:1; i.e., Christ; see "The Work of the Little Horn and the Prince," p. 1040). In 9:25, the Messiah is called nagid—a similar term (ruler or prince). Since the scene in the vision took place in heaven, it is obvious that we are dealing with the heavenly sanctuary, and since it was related to the work of Christian Rome, it described Christ's work after His ascension. The vision described a conflict between the little horn and the ascended Lord. In fulfilling the vision, how was the little horn to magnify itself against Christ? By openly assuming the office of Christ as mediator between God and humans, apostate Christendom would exalt itself against the Prince of the host and would fulfill 2 Thessalonians 2:4.

In the vision, the little horn also took away the tamid—"continual" or "daily" (the word "sacrifice" is not in the text but is supplied in most translations). This Hebrew word is frequently used in connection with the ritual in the sanctuary, not only with the sacrifices. Various parts of the sanctuary ministration in the OT are qualified by tamid, such as the burnt offering (Num. 29:6), the lamp that was to burn continually (tamid; Ex. 27:20), the fire to be kept burning on the altar (tamid; Lev. 6:13), and the bread that was to be (tamid) on the table (Num. 4:7). The word designates cultic activities performed on a regular basis, every day or once a week, in the courtyard or inside the Holy Place of the tabernacle. The term is never used with respect to the ritual of the Day of Atonement. Daniel is providing for us a view of the priestly work of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary. He is performing the antitypical work of mediation and intercession typologically represented by the daily work of the priests in the Holy Place of the earthly sanctuary (Heb. 7:25; 8:1–2).

Furthermore, the little horn cast down God's sanctuary (lit. "the place of His sanctuary"). There are two sanctuaries in Scripture: the earthly (Ex. 25:9, 40) and the heavenly (Heb. 8:1–6). The second Jerusalem temple was destroyed in A.D. 70. Yet even at that time it was not "His sanctuary" anymore (Matt. 23:37–39; 27:50–51). The only sanctuary functioning after Christ's ascension was the heavenly one.

In fulfilling the prophecy, how did apostate Christianity take away the daily and cast down the place of its sanctuary? By placing the work of intercession into the hands of priests through the confessional and by sacrificing Christ anew in every mass, spiritual Rome removed Christ's heavenly ministry from the thinking of people. Through the absolution of sins, the Roman priests occupied the place of Jesus before believers. These teachings and practices led to the overthrowing of the ministry of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary in the minds of many

The Little Horn and Antiochus IV

Characteristics of the Little Horn	Reasons Why the Little Horn Is Not Antiochus IV
The little horn came up among ten horns (7:8).	Antiochus IV did not come up among ten Hellenistic kings.
Three horns were plucked out before it (v. 8).	There is no historical evidence that Antiochus uprooted three kingdoms.
The little horn became greater than his fellows (v. 20).	Antiochus was not greater than the other kings in his time. In fact, the presence of the Roman ambassador Popilius Laenas, without an army, was sufficient to cause Antiochus IV to withdraw from Egypt. Seleucus I and Antiochus III the Great were definitely greater Syrian kings than Antiochus IV.
The saints were to be given into his hands for three-and-a-half times/years (v. 25).	According to 1 Maccabees 1:54; 4:52–54, the desecration of the temple lasted only three years and ten days. According to 2 Maccabees 10:3–4, the desecration of the temple lasted only two years.
As indicated, there appears to be a definite progression of increasing greatness from Medo-Persia to Greece to the little horn (8:4, 8, 9, etc.).	Antiochus IV's kingdom was not greater than Medo-Persia or Greece.
It would last for 2,300 days, and then the sanctuary was to be cleansed (v. 14).	The sanctuary defiled by Antiochus was cleansed after three years and ten days, not after six years and approximately four months if the 2,300 days are taken as a literal time reference.
The little horn was to come in the latter days of their kingdom (v. 23).	Antiochus IV was the eighth king in the Seleucid kingdom. He was followed by another twenty kings.

Christians, and its place was effectively taken by human substitutes. Through the mass and the confessional, the minds of Christian believers are drawn away from a continual dependence upon the mediatorial ministry of the Savior in His sanctuary. By elaborate ceremonies, all in the name of Christ, the ministry of Christ is obscured and lost sight of. The full forgiveness that Christ offers to those who put their trust in His perfect righteousness is taken away, and its place is taken by an ineffective pardon dispensed by humans.

In v. 12, the little horn continued its attack on Christ's ministry in heaven. The beginning of v. 12 has been translated and understood differ-ently: some take tsaba'—"army" or "host"—to refer to a different army from the one previously mentioned in v. 11. There the tsaba' referred to God's people, as it evidently does in v. 13 also. If so, this other tsaba' would be referring to a spiritual army, the Roman priesthood, through which the little horn would operate its counterfeit daily (see below, "The Work of the Little Horn and the Prince").

As its final action in the prophecy, the little horn threw the truth to the ground—that is, he rejected and disregarded it. The Lord Jesus said of Himself, "I am...the truth" (John 14:6). In another place, but with not greatly different meaning, He said, "Your word is truth" (John

The Work of the Little Horn and the Prince

Daniel 8 contains an apocalyptic narrative describing a conflict between the little horn and the Prince of the heavenly hosts. It is part of the cosmic conflict and will result in its closing. The narrative combines military and cultic language that helps us understand the nature of the little horn. We will summarize the findings of the previous exposition of the text.

1. Little Horn in Daniel 7 and 8. It is difficult to ignore the parallelism between the little horn in Daniel 7 and 8. A summary of the similarities may suffice: (1) both are represented by the same symbol, a horn (7:8; 8:9); (2) the title "little" or "small" applies to both (7:8; 8:9); (3) both become "great" (7:20; 8:9); (4) both are persecuting powers (7:21, 25; 8:10, 24); (5) both persecute the people or the saints (7:27; 8:24); (6) both seek self-exaltation (7:8, 11; 8:10–12); (7) both exercise a crafty intelligence (7:8; 8:23–25); (8) both represent the enemy of God at the climax of the vision (7:8–9, 25–26; 8:12–14, 25); (9) both are associated with prophetic time (7:25; 8:14); (10) both of their activities reach the time of the end (7:25–26; 8:17–19); and (11) both are finally destroyed (7:11, 26; 8:25). These similarities demonstrate that we are dealing with the same religiopolitical power—Christian Rome. The prophecy has taken us from the Medo-Persian Empire, through the Greek and Roman ones, and into the Christian era.

2. Initial Work of the Little Horn. The horn was to interact at the horizontal level with other earthly powers. The prophecy shows that it was to grow through aggressive military expansion and to become great (v. 9) like the other two kingdoms (vv. 4, 8). It was to extend itself to the south, the east, and the land of Israel with unstoppable aggression. This first stage of growth was to be fundamentally of a military and political nature. Verse 10 is transitional because, although it refers to the servants of God on earth, at the same time it points to the heavenly host (cf. 10:13). It introduces an important shift in the work of the little horn.

3. Vertical Move. By launching an attack against the people of God, the horn moved to the vertical dimension of its conquests. It was reaching out to control those belonging to the Lord. The term "host" refers in the OT to troops or an army (Deut. 20:9; 1 Kin. 2:5; Ps. 60:10), but when it is associated with God, it designates the people of Israel as God's army (Ex. 6:26; 7:4) or the army of God's angels (Ps. 103:19–21). A leader of the army of Israel is called "a commander of the hosts"/"a commander of the armies" (Deut. 20:9; 1 Sam. 14:50; 26:5; 1 Kin. 2:5). The earthly and the heavenly hosts work closely together in the realization of the Lord's plan. It could be said that an attack against one of them is an attack against the other. Interestingly, "host" is used in the context of the sanctuary to refer to the Levitical guard in charge of protecting the sanctuary from those intending to violate its holiness (Num.

4:3, 23, 30). This usage fits very well into Daniel's prophecy.

The apocalyptic narrative speaks about a military and political power that would go through a radical change in its search for power. It would intend to take the war to a new level: a celestial one associated with the heavenly temple. It would try to achieve what the fallen cherub had attempted to do (Is. 14:12–13). From this point on, the primary emphasis of the text in Daniel is on language related to the sanctuary and its services. The little horn was to become a political and religious power opposing God and His people. In this new move, the first enemy the horn was to face would be the Levitical guard/army that would protect God's dwelling (Dan. 8:10). It would be able to throw down or overcome them and then to trample or humiliate them. But the victory was not to be total because the horn would overcome only "some" of them (v. 10). Nevertheless, there would be a breach, and the horn would take advantage of it.

4. The Work of the Prince. In the vision, the first target in the attack was the heavenly host. The second was the Prince or Commander of the host—the Prince of the heavenly army, as revealed in the experience of Joshua, who as prince of the earthly army of the Lord had met the Prince of the heavenly hosts (Josh. 5:14). Daniel refers to this Prince as the Messiah and the heavenly high priest. The term prince/commander was also applied to the Israelite high priest, and in Daniel the context indicates the Prince's function as a high priest (cf. 1 Chr. 24:5; Ezra 10:5). In the prophecy, He officiated in the heavenly temple and was responsible for the daily services—the work of mediation on behalf of the people (Dan. 8:10). The parallel with the judgment scene in 7:9–10, 13–14 also shows the Prince as directly involved as high priest in the final judgment, typologically represented by the services of the Day of Atonement (see "The Theology of the Day of Atonement," p. 264, and "The Cleansing of the Sanctuary and Judgment in Daniel," p. 1043). This facet of His work is announced in v. 14: "Then the sanctuary shall be cleansed." This Prince is none other than the high priest mentioned in Hebrews who officiates in the true tent/tabernacle set up by God, not human beings (Heb. 8:2). Through His incarnation, sacrificial death, resurrection, and ascension, He is totally qualified to be our high priest in the heavenly sanctuary.

5. The Little Horn against the Prince. Because the work of the Prince is of such importance for the redemption of humans, the horn would threaten it. In the prophecy, it removed the continual (or daily) from the Prince by usurping His priestly work. It also threw down the place of the sanctuary. The adverb "down" is an addition not found in the Hebrew text. When the verb is used without a preposition or an adverb, it means to abandon, reject, or forsake. The "place of the sanctuary"/"foundation of the sanctuary" refers metaphorically to the very essence and purpose of the sanctuary (cf. Ps. 89:14) as the place where the Prince was to perform His work of mediation, intercession, and forgiveness of sins. In the vision, the little horn rejected or forsook the true nature of the sanctuary and its services and established its own.

Once the little horn claims to be in control of the daily services, it appoints its own host/army (human priestly system) to perform its own religious services. This is considered to be an act of rebellion (Dan. 8:12). According to 11:31, the work of the little horn profaned (not "defiled," for the Heb. verb is khalal, "to profane"; it is not tame', "to contaminate," "defile") the sanctuary by treating it as a common place. In the prophecy, the horn expressed its rejection of the order established by God and regulated through His law, acting against God's sovereignty. The horn finally threw the truth to the ground (8:12). Contextually, "truth" refers to the truth about the daily and the sanctuary and summarizes the work of the horn. But the term is broad enough to include the revelation of God's redemptive plan as well as the revelation of His will for us (see 7:25). Truth was to be despised and disregarded by this prophesied religiopolitical power. Although in the vision, the horn did what it intended to do (8:12; interpreted as being in the future in v. 24), at the end of the narrative we are informed that it "shall be broken without human means," in other words, by God Himself. The Prince would be victorious (12:1–3).

17:17). How the written truth of Scripture has been cast down by apostate Christianity is well known. From the twelfth century onward, various popes prohibited the use of the Bible in the vernacular. The Council of Trent in 1546 decreed that no one was to interpret Scripture contrary to the interpretation given by the church, the church being the judge of the true sense of Scripture.

In 1897, Pope Leo XIII, in an encyclical letter, forbade all versions of the Bible, in any vernacular language, made by non-Catholics. Today, of course, the picture has changed. In 1943, Pope Pius XII issued an encyclical letter urging priests to study and preach from Scripture, to help Catholic associations to spread Scripture in modern languages, and to encourage the laity to read the Bible daily. What has not changed is the conviction that Scripture and tradition continue to have the same authority in the life and beliefs of the church. History clearly shows that not only has the Bible been placed on the same level as tradition but that the church continues to be the final interpreter of Scripture.

8:13–14. Time Period: Cleansing of the Sanctuary. In vv. 13 and 14, Daniel heard two heavenly beings speaking to each other. One asked the other how long it would be for the events in the vision to take place. The question was not about how long the desolation would last but about the historical time period that this vision would cover. The scope of the whole vision—beginning in v. 3, which reached back to the time of the Persian ram (v. 20) and extended forward to the time of the end (vv. 17, 19, 26)—was in view. The time element encompassed all the events mentioned in the vision (see “The Cleansing of the Sanctuary and Judgment in Daniel,” p. 1043).

The answer given was 2,300 evenings and mornings—some translations have “days.” The phrase “evening and morning” appears in the Creation account, where it constitutes one calendar day (Gen. 1:5, 8, 13, 19, 23, 31). The 2,300 prophetic days/years would reach to the time of the end (Dan. 8:17). In 9:24–27, Gabriel explained that this long time period was connected with and included the first coming of the long-expected Messiah and extended to the year A.D. 1844 (see chap. 9).

At the end of the 2,300 evenings and mornings, the sanctuary would be nitsdaq, from the verb tsadaq. This is the only place where this particular verbal form of tsadaq appears in the entire OT. This latter root word (tsadaq) has the basic meaning “to be just or righteous” or “to be in the right.” Apart from this basic meaning, it could express the idea of being “put right,” in the sense of restored to its rightful place, “to be clean”/“to be pure,” “to cleanse”/“to purify,” or even “to justify” or “vindicate” (for further analysis of the term, see “The Cleansing of the Sanctuary and Judgment in Daniel,” p. 1043).

The cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary corresponds to the cleansing of the Mosaic tabernacle on the Day of Atonement once every year (Lev. 16:30). As the Israelites had a daily and a yearly service in the respective first and second apartments of the earthly sanctuary, so Jesus in the heavenly sanctuary performs the daily service, in other words, His intercessory ministry, and is now also performing a work of judgment equivalent to the Day of Atonement as a day of judgment.

The context of the prophecy of Daniel 8:14 shows that what was cast down—the daily sacrifice, the truth, and the sanctuary’s place—was to be restored at the end of the 2,300 evenings and mornings. While the translation “shall be restored” serves well to indicate the restoration of the truth about the sanctuary, the rendering “shall be cleansed” conveys the important truth of the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary (see Heb. 9:23).

Daniel 8 describes, in apocalyptic symbols, a deeply religious conflict between Christ, the Prince of the host, and the little horn, apostate Christianity, with each side offering a plan of salvation. During the judgment described in Daniel 7, the true plan of salvation is reestablished, God’s people are vindicated, and the little horn is condemned. While this judgment is taking place in heaven, the people of God on earth continue to depend on His grace, walking humbly with Him and restoring the truth cast down to the ground by the little horn, particularly the biblical teaching of the high-priestly work of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary. In this sense they are also participating in the restoration of the sanctuary on earth (see Rev. 11:1).

8:15–27. Gabriel’s Interpretation of the Vision. The vision strongly impacted Daniel intellectually and emotionally. He was trying and was unable to understand it. Since he could not understand it (cf. 1 Pet. 1:10–12), the angel Gabriel was sent to help him ascertain the import of the vision (mar’eh, the term used in regard to the evenings and mornings).

In the OT, the name Gabriel occurs only here and in Daniel 9:21. In the NT, he appears several times in Luke 1. He tells the prophet that the vision (khazon, the totality of the vision) reaches to the “time of the end” when the desolating power was to be destroyed (cf. 2 Thess. 2:8). The phrase “time of the end” is found only in the book of Daniel (Dan. 8:17; 11:35, 40; 12:4, 9) as a technical term for the final period of human history leading up to Christ’s return. Based on the historicist method of interpretation, the books of Daniel and Revelation indicate that this “time of the end” began at the close of the 1,260-year period in 1798 (see 12:40; see also “The 1,260 Days/Years,” p. 1037).

In vv. 20–22, Gabriel explains the symbolic details of the vision recorded in vv. 3–8 but not the vision related to the “evenings and mornings” in vv. 13 and 14. This is left for chapter 9. Gabriel said that the ram symbolizes the kings of Media and Persia and the goat symbolizes the king(dom) of Greece. This is an important passage for the interpretation of all the visions in Daniel because this is the only

The Cleansing of the Sanctuary and Judgment in Daniel

It is generally acknowledged by many scholars representing different Christian traditions that the temple/sanctuary motif plays a significant role in the book of Daniel. The services in the Israelite sanctuary were performed to preserve and strengthen the relationship of the worshipers with the covenant Lord and, whenever necessary, to restore, through atonement, a broken relationship with Him (see Leviticus: Introduction). The priestly ministry consisted of a work of mediation performed on a regular basis (the daily services) in the courtyard of the sanctuary and in the Holy Place. Once a year, during the Day of Atonement, the sanctuary was cleansed from the sins and impurities of the people of Israel (see “The Theology of the Day of Atonement,” p. 264). These two services pointed typologically to the high-priestly work of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary. Daniel addresses both of them (see “The Work of the Little Horn and the Prince,” p. 1040). Here we will concentrate on the cleansing of the sanctuary mentioned in Daniel 8:13–14.

1. Context of the Passage. The context employs, within a few verses (vv. 9–14), a significant number of Hebrew terms often found in the setting of the sanctuary/temple services or having sanctuary connotations. We are referring to terms like “the daily,” “regular,” or “continual” (tamid; Ex. 29:42; Num. 28:3; Lev. 6:13); “holy,” (v. 2); “sanctuary” (miqdash; Dan. 8:11; Ex. 25:8; Lev. 26:2); “glorious”/“beautiful” (Dan. 11:45); “host”/“army”/“service” (tsaba; Num. 4:3, 5); “prince”/“commander” (sar; 1 Chr. 24:5); “take away” (Lev. 2:9; 4:8); “horn” (v.

7); “transgression”/“rebellion” (16:16); and “truth,” which could designate the true instruction given by the priests to the people (Mal. 2:6). This language is related to the sanctuary and its services in a context dealing primarily with the daily service (the tamid), and, as indicated, it serves to identify the Prince as a heavenly high priest. The movement to the Day of Atonement is addressed in Daniel 8:13–14.

2. “Then the Sanctuary Shall be Cleansed” (v. 14). The Hebrew verb nitsdaq (“to be brought to its right state”), a verbal form used only here in the OT, is from the root tsadaq, meaning primarily “to be righteous,” “to be vindicated.” It is employed in the OT in three different contexts. First, in legal contexts it designates the restoration of the legal rights of a person falsely accused of a crime. The innocent who was charged with a crime was to seek the Lord’s vindication in the sanctuary (e.g., Ps. 7:8), and the Lord would vindicate him or her (9:4). When the righteous were acquitted, the accuser would be condemned by the Lord (7:8–9; Deut. 25:1). Second, it is used in the context of salvation. Since those who are vindicated by God are delivered from oppression, the terms “salvation” and “righteousness” are used as synonyms (Ps. 98:2–8; Is. 1:27; 46:13).

Third, it is used in the context of the sanctuary services. In Leviticus what is required in order to have access to the sanctuary is purity obtained through sacrificial atonement. In the book of Psalms, what is required to enter the temple is “righteousness” or “vindication” granted to the worshipers as a gift from the Lord in the sanctuary (Ps. 24:3–5). These people were righteous not only because they remained loyal to the covenant but also because their sins had been forgiven (Ps. 32:1–2, 11). In the book of Daniel, the verb tsadaq is connected to kipper (“to make atonement”), which expresses the idea of the removal of sin or impurity (Dan. 9:24). The concept of righteousness is deeply connected to the sanctuary/temple. The Israelites had access to the temple through “the gates of righteousness” (Ps. 118:19), brought a righteous sacrifice (4:5), and the priest, a mediator before the Lord who “is righteous” (11:7), officiated while clothed with righteousness (132:9). Consequently, the worshiper received blessing from the Lord and righteousness/vindication from God, the Savior (24:5). This person “has clean hands and a pure heart” (v. 4). The person was declared righteous/purified/vindicated.

The connection between the Hebrew root tsadaq or its noun form tsedeq and the sanctuary is indicated by the fact that they are used as synonyms for words related to purity, cleanness, and justification (18:20; 51:4). One of the best examples of this linguistic phenomenon is found in Isaiah 53:11. God’s righteous (tsadiq) Servant would justify (yatsdiq) many, for He would bear their iniquities (by removing/cleansing them from iniquity). To be declared righteous by God is the same as to be cleansed/purified and thus forgiven from sin, and, as an act of divine salvation, it vindicates the people of God.

Since the root tsadaq expresses in some contexts, particularly in a sanctuary setting, the concept of cleansing, it is expected to find it used this way in Daniel 8:14. The ancient Greek translation of the OT, the LXX, as well as the first-century Greek Theodotion translation, renders the Hebrew nitsdaq in v. 14 by the Greek verb katharizō, “to cleanse” (the same Greek term used in the LXX in Lev. 16 for the cleansing of the sanctuary). Also, in the Aramaic translation of the Hebrew Bible (the Targums), nitsdaq is translated as “to be pure,” “to be clean” in 40 percent of its occurrences. If the meaning of the Hebrew verb nitsdaq is “to be brought to its right state,” the best interpretational option would be to find in the use of the verb in Daniel a reference to the moment when the Israelite sanctuary was restored to its right state or condition, namely, the Day of Atonement. It is useful to observe that the word translated in Daniel 8:14 as “sanctuary” (godesh) is the same Hebrew word used in Leviticus 16, the chapter dealing with the Day of Atonement, to refer to the Most Holy Place of the tabernacle (vv. 2–3, 16–17, 20, 23, 27, 33). It was during this day that all sin and uncleanness was removed from the tabernacle and its purity and holiness were restored.

3. The Question of Time. The reference to the Day of Atonement is introduced by a question that one holy being asked another (Dan. 8:13). The question was not how long the little horn would usurp the work of the Prince of the hosts but about the time period that was to cover the fulfillment of the whole vision. A literal translation of the question makes this clear: “Until when the vision [khazon], the daily [tamid], and the rebellion/transgression [pasha] that causes desolation to give both the host and the sanctuary a trampling?” The “vision” refers to v. 1 and designates the totality of the vision, the “daily” refers to the work of the Prince (v. 11), and the “rebellion” designates the work of the little horn (vv. 11–12). The question was how long the vision (vv. 3–14), including the daily and the rebellion, would last (“Until when?”). It was not about how long the little horn would be able to usurp the daily.

Within this long period of 2,300 prophetic days, the kingdoms of Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome and its subsequent division would pass away, and the little horn would oppose the priestly work of the Prince. Then, after the 2,300 days, the antitypical Day of Atonement would begin. The question indicates that the 2,300 days/years (see “Interpreting Biblical Apocalyptic Prophecies,” p. 46) would begin during the time of the Medo-Persian Empire—a more specific date is provided in Daniel 9.

4. A Day of Judgment in Daniel. The Day of Atonement was essentially a day of judgment when God and His people were vindicated and their ultimate enemy deleted from God’s creation (see “The Theology of the Day of Atonement,” p. 264). In Daniel, we find several important insights on the topic. First, judgment is clearly coupled with the Day of Atonement. Apart from the fact that tsadaq is a legal term, the parallels between Daniel 7 and 8 demonstrate the direct connection between the Day of Atonement and judgment. In both chapters the kingdoms of Medo-Persia (7:5; 8:3-4) and Greece (7:6; 8:5-8) are mentioned, as well as Rome and the little horn (7:7-8; 8:9-12). In Daniel 7, after the struggles between the little horn and the Lord and His people, we find the judgment scene and the final disposition of God's enemies (vv. 13-14, 26-27). In Daniel 8, we find at the same juncture the reference to the purification of the sanctuary and the final disposition of God's enemies (vv. 13-14, 25). The parallel between the two chapters makes clear that the cleansing of the sanctuary and the judgment in heaven refer to the same event, in other words, the Day of Atonement.

Second, the judgment described in Daniel 7 was to take place in heaven, before the Son of Man and the saints would receive the kingdom. The preparations for the initiation of the heavenly judicial inquest were to begin while the little horn would still be active in its opposition to the people of God (vv. 9-14). Therefore, the judgment was to begin before the Second Coming of Christ, and consequently it could be called a pre-advent judgment. It would also be proper to call it an investigative judgment because the heavenly books would be opened to analyze the life of God's people. Third, the reception of the kingdom was to be the divine verdict, pronounced in the judgment in heaven, on behalf of God's people (vv. 21-22). Their ultimate destiny is firmly grounded on a legal process, which is accessible to the dwellers of the cosmos (v. 10) and shows their immovable faith commitment to the covenant Lord who redeemed them. Fourth, the vindication of God's people would result in the defeat of the little horn that unjustly oppressed them (v. 26). This decision, made in heaven, would be executed within history. Through judgment, destinies were to be determined before any rewards would be given. Fifth, Daniel speaks not only about the beginning of the judgment (vv. 9-10) but also about the moment of its end (12:1-3), when the work of Michael the Prince, as the high priest of God's people, would come to an end. In the absence of a Mediator before God for wicked humanity, there would be an unparalleled time of trouble on earth, but deliverance would only come to those with names preserved in the heavenly book after the judgment (12:1). This will be followed by the resurrection of some to eternal life and others to everlasting death (vv. 2, 13). In the biblical time frame, the investigative judgment in heaven precedes the granting of rewards. Finally, the prophecy indicates that after the judgment, and as a result of it, God's cosmic order would be reestablished by His everlasting kingdom (7:27).

5. Cleansing and Cosmic Judgment. The book of Daniel and the rest of the Scriptures show that the removal or cleansing of sin from the universe is grounded in a legal process beginning in the heavenly temple of God as the center of cosmic governance. First, theodicy is at the center of the Day of Atonement as a day of judgment. The Godhead has been involved in the cleansing of God's people from sin and uncleanness through the sacrifice of Christ (1 John 1:7) and the work of the Spirit in the human heart (Titus 3:5-6). This saving and cleansing act of God on behalf of sinners is a magnificent revelation of His love and will demonstrate that He is indeed righteous and loving (1 John 3:16; 4:10). The display of His love on the cross will have been so powerful that at the end even the evil powers will recognize the love, mercy, and justice of God (Phil. 2:9-10). Second, God's people are vindicated before the universe, for the judgment will reveal that they found justification only in Christ, in other words, in what God had done for them through His Son. Third, the judgment will therefore provide a solid legal basis for the cleansing of the universe from all evil powers, sin, and death. It will reveal that their presence in God's creation was totally unnecessary and damaging to God's established order at Creation. After the cleansing of the cosmos, the eschatological Day of Atonement will restore cosmic order through God's work of re-creation.

We can summarize the biblical understanding of the final judgment in terms of three phases, each one containing an investigation and a verdict.

(1) The Pre-Advent Judgment in Heaven. This is the judgment of those who have claimed at some point in their lives to belong to God. It involves an examination of their lives in the divine tribunal (Rom. 14:10; 2 Cor. 5:10) and judgment according to their works (1 Cor. 3:8–15; Eph. 6:8). Works reveal where the heart is and will provide objective evidence to show that God's people have been firmly established in their faith in Jesus and are covered by His righteousness. This pre-advent judgment in heaven involves believers giving an account of themselves to God (Rom. 14:12), not in person but through Jesus, as their Mediator, speaking for them and confessing them before God and the angels in heaven (Luke 12:8–9; cf. Heb. 7:25; 1 John 2:1). At the Second Coming, they will receive the benefit of the verdict pronounced on their behalf in heaven. It will be on the day of divine wrath (the Second Coming) that God's righteous verdict (dikaiokrisia) will be revealed, and He will render to each person according to what he or she has done (Rom. 2:5–6). The verdicts determined in heaven will be made public on earth at the return of Christ. The judgment of God's people begins in heaven before the coming of Christ, and they will be rewarded at the Second Coming (e.g., Heb. 9:28). They will be saved while the wicked that are alive will perish (2 Thess. 1:3–10).

(2) Millennial Judgment. This judgment takes place after the Second Coming when God's people in heaven will participate in the judgment of the wicked (Rev. 20:4). Paul expressed the idea well when he stated that God's holy people will judge the world (1 Cor. 6:2). They will even judge the fallen angels (v. 3). During the Millennium they will examine the heavenly records of the deeds of the wicked, and a verdict will be pronounced against them. This decision will be revealed to them after the Millennium.

(3) Executive Judgment. After the Millennium, Satan, his fallen angels, and the wicked of the earth will stand before the throne of God to receive their final reward. The evidence for their eternal condemnation will be presented to them to clearly understand the reason for their exclusion from the company of the redeemed ones (Rev. 20:12–13). They see the records of their lives and the immensity of the love of God in saving the righteous ones and condemning the wicked. This will be the moment when the cosmic theodicy takes place and the whole cosmos, including the wicked, will acknowledge the justice and love of God (Phil. 2:9–10; see "The Theology of the Day of Atonement," p. 264). The moment has come for the cosmos to experience eternal cleansing from the presence and effect of evil. This will be the permanent return to Eden for the human race.

place where the second and third kingdoms in the four-kingdom scheme are clearly identified by the angel himself. It is one of the passages historicists can use to show that the historicist method of interpretation is found in the book of Daniel itself.

As already indicated, after the death of Alexander, his kingdom was divided into four Greek kingdoms (see 7:6). When the iniquity of these kingdoms had reached a point of no return (8:23; see Gen. 15:16), the Roman Empire would begin to rule the then-known world. Rome was the fierce king described in Daniel 8:23. This is an allusion to Deuteronomy 28:50, which was a passage long understood as applying to the Romans and their oppression of the Jews. The statement that the little horn was to be strong and mighty, but not by his own power (Dan. 8:24), suggests that Christian Rome would be mighty by means of the secular powers over which it exercised spiritual control and behind which there was an evil power (cf. Rev. 13:2, 4). The little horn would misuse intelligence and wisdom through deception to establish and enforce the convictions of this power (see "The Little Horn in Daniel 7," p. 1035).

Yet in the end, the little horn would be broken without human power. Evil may assert itself for a long time, but it will be destroyed by divine decree in the end. The metal image in the prophecy in Daniel 2 came to an end by a stone prepared without human hands (2:45), and the little horn would have its dominion taken away by the heavenly court (7:26). So, the willful king who is the main actor in Daniel's most detailed prophecy would likewise come to his end, and no one would help him (11:45).

Finally, the angel confirmed to Daniel the reliability of the vision (mar'eh) of the evenings and mornings, which was not interpreted for him (8:26). He was told to seal up the vision (khazon) because it primarily dealt with events related to the distant future (lit. “for many days,” that is to say, “many years” or “the time of the end”; v. 17). Daniel had a general grasp of the meaning of the vision, except for the section dealing with the evening and mornings, the mar’eh. He was disturbed by it and could not understand it.

9:1–27

THE COMING OF THE MESSIAH

Ten years had passed since the vision of chapter 8, and during that time Babylon, the conqueror of Israel, had fallen to the Medo-Persians, but the Jews were still in exile in Babylon. Daniel seems to have been interested in the political changes and their significance for his people. This chapter is formed by an introduction (9:1–2), Daniel’s prayer (vv. 3–19), and the prophecy of the seventy weeks (vv. 20–27). There is a clear connection between this chapter and the prophecy of the 2,300 days recorded in chapter 8.

9:1–19

Introduction and Prayer

The chapter opens with a dating statement of great importance for Daniel and his people: the Babylonian Empire had ended, and a new one had arisen. Daniel’s prophecy of the four kingdoms had been partially fulfilled. The date is also important in that it implies the arrival of the moment for the liberation of God’s people from exile. King Cyrus, the messianic figure announced by Isaiah (Is. 44:28–45:4), was reigning, and hope was rekindled in God’s people, particularly in Daniel. Through a study of Jeremiah, Daniel understood that the prophecy of the seventy years of the desolation of the land would soon come to an end. He was most probably concerned about the relationship between the seventy years and the prophecy of the 2,300 years that he had not been able to understand. Although the longer period is related to the seventy weeks, the prophecy of the seventy years prepares the way for the other. The prophet looked forward in hope while facing deep uncertainty; he prayed.

The reason for Daniel’s prayer was his misunderstanding of the vision in chapter 8. Although according to Jeremiah’s prophecy (Jer. 29:10) the time for the return of the Jews to Jerusalem was close at hand, Daniel’s last vision gave him the impression that it would be a long time before the sanctuary/temple was restored to its right condition. Daniel no doubt feared that God intended to prolong the period of captivity because of Israel’s sins. The prayer is one of the longest and most moving prayers recorded in Scripture. It models the nature of prophetic mediation that anticipates the role of the coming Messiah as the supreme Mediator between humans and God. As mediator, Daniel pleads for the people dispersed throughout the nations and for the leaders in Jerusalem and Judah (Dan. 9:7). First, he stands before the Lord as their representative (cf. Heb. 7:25). Second, he identifies himself with his sinful people and asks God to forgive and bless them (Dan. 9:8–9; 2 Cor. 5:21). Third, Daniel recognizes that God has shown Himself to be righteous in what He has done to His people (Dan. 9:7, 18; see Rom. 3:25–26), thus representing God before the people. Finally, Daniel appeals to God’s mercy and not to human achievements as he prays for forgiveness (Dan. 9:18; see Matt. 7:11; John 16:24).

9:20–27

The Seventy Weeks

While Daniel was still praying, Gabriel appeared and delivered to him one of the most important messianic prophecies found in the OT. Daniel 9:24–27 is to a certain extent the foundation stone of the Christian religion because it predicted almost six hundred years in advance not only the time when the Messiah would appear but also the duration of His public ministry, His atoning death for humanity, and His work as Mediator in the heavenly temple. In his prayer Daniel uses three different names to address God: Yahweh (vv. 4, 8, 10, 13–14); Adonai (vv. 4, 7, 9, 15–16, 19); and Elohim (vv. 4, 9–11, 13–15, 17–20, 23).

9:20–23. Coming of Gabriel and Daniel 8. In response to Daniel’s prayer, the angel Gabriel was sent again (vv. 20–21; cf. 8:16–17) to help him understand the vision (v. 23; mar’eh). The information Gabriel provided did not describe a new vision but was an explanation of that part of the earlier vision in chapter 8 that Daniel did not understand (8:27). What he did not understand was the time element—the 2,300 evenings and mornings. He had received an explanation for the animals, the four horns, and the little horn (vv. 20–25) but not for the 2,300 evenings and mornings.

There are some specific links between Daniel 8 and 9 that show a close connection between both chapters. First, the same angel, Gabriel, revisited Daniel (8:16; 9:21); second, Daniel makes reference to the vision of chapter 8 (9:21); third, Gabriel came to give Daniel understanding of the previous vision (v. 23); fourth, the time element not explained in Daniel 8 is now discussed in 9:24–27; fifth, in both chapters Daniel uses two words for vision, khazon (8:1, 2, 13, 15, 17, 26; 9:21, 24) and mar'eh (8:16, 26–27; 9:23). When in 8:26 Gabriel said that “the vision [mar'eh] of the evenings and mornings” was true, he was referring to the time prophecy of the 2,300 years. Upon returning he said that he had come to help Daniel understand the mar'eh vision (9:23). In other words, what Daniel did not understand was the time element in Daniel 8. In Daniel 9 Gabriel came to him again and said that he would explain the time element of the 2,300 evenings and mornings.

9:24. Goal of the Seventy Weeks. According to the year-day principle, seventy weeks are 490 years (see “Interpreting Biblical Apocalyptic Prophecies,” p. 46). Gabriel told Daniel that the seventy weeks were “decreed” or “determined” for his people. The Hebrew word khatak used here could also mean “to cut off.” This is the only occurrence of this root in the Hebrew Bible, but in postbiblical Hebrew it is used to mean “to cut,” “to cut off.” In the LXX, the Greek translation of the OT, the verb used is suntemno, which means “to cut,” “to cut off,” “to chop up,” or “to divide.” Contextually, that is to say, in view of the connections between Daniel 8 and 9, the seventy weeks or 490 years are “cut off” from the longer period of the 2,300 evenings and mornings in Daniel 8:14. The great work to be accomplished within the seventy-week period is listed using six infinitive constructions in three pairs.

To finish and to bring sin to an end; to eliminate (kalah) it. Jesus came “to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself” (Heb. 9:26), thus providing salvation for those who place their faith in Him (Rom. 3–5; 2 Cor. 5:17–21). To atone (kipper, “to make atonement”; some translations have “make reconciliation”) for wickedness and to bring in everlasting righteousness. This was all achieved through the atoning sacrifice of Jesus Christ on the cross (cf. 1 John 2:2). It is only through Christ’s atonement that we can be declared righteous by faith (Is. 53:11–12; Rom. 3:4–5; 21–31). To seal means to authenticate something and to affirm its genuineness. In the context of a prophecy, it means that the prophecy is authenticated when what it has announced finds its fulfillment in history. Here the prophecy is the messianic prophecy of the seventy weeks. Its fulfillment was to establish that God spoke through Daniel and that the rest of his prophecy would also be fulfilled. The coming of Christ is considered to be the fulfillment of prophecy (e.g., Matt. 2:5–6). According to Paul, He came at the appropriate prophetic time (Gal. 4:4). Jesus Himself announced the fulfillment of this prophecy in Mark 1:14–15 when at the beginning of his ministry He said that the time was fulfilled or had come. Such an expression would have been clearly understood as referencing the prophecy of Daniel 9.

To anoint the Most Holy is not a reference to the anointing of Jesus as the Messiah because the phrase “Most Holy” is practically always used in the OT to refer to the sanctuary or something connected with it (e.g., Ex. 26:33; 29:37; 30:10, 29; Num. 4:4, 19). The best interpretation is to find a reference here to the anointing of the heavenly sanctuary, where the Messiah, Christ, began His high-priestly work after His ascension toward the end of the seventy weeks (Heb. 9:18–24; cf. Ex. 40:9–16). This echoes the anointing of the earthly sanc-

2,300 Years Prophecy (Daniel 8 and 9)

457 B.C. Beginning of the 70 weeks (490 years). Marked by the command to restore and rebuild Jerusalem (9:25) issued by the Persian king Artaxerxes I in the seventh year of his reign (Ezra 7:11-26).

A.D. 27. End of the 69 weeks (483 years) predicted for the coming of Messiah the Prince (Dan. 9:25) and beginning of the last week. Fulfilled in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar when Jesus was baptized and began His ministry (Luke 3:1, 21).

A.D. 31. Middle of the last week (Dan. 9:27) of the 70 weeks (490 years). After 3 1/2 years of earthly ministry, the death of Christ confirmed a covenant for the benefit of all.

A.D. 34. End of the 70 weeks (490 years). Marked by the martyrdom of Stephen and the related persecution that scattered Christians from Judea, which thus spread the gospel to the Gentiles.

A.D. 1844. End of the 2,300 days (2,300 years). Marked the beginning of the cleansing of the heavenly sanctuary and the end-time work of judgment.

tuary during the priestly ordination ritual (Lev. 8:10–12).

9:25–27. Chronology of the Seventy Weeks.

The beginning of the seventy weeks is the decree (lit. “word”) to restore and rebuild Jerusalem (v. 25). The beginning point of the 490 years was to be a particular decree issued to restore and rebuild Jerusalem. The books of Ezra and Nehemiah record three main decrees dealing with Jerusalem and its temple: (1) the decree from Cyrus in 538 B.C. to rebuild the temple (Ezra 1:2–4); (2) the decree of Darius in 519 B.C., confirming the previous one (6:3–12); and (3) the decree of Artaxerxes I in 457 B.C. (7:12–26; cf. Neh. 2:4–10). Only the last one allowed the Jews to restore and rebuild Jerusalem. The restoration was not about the physical rebuilding of the city but about returning the city to the Jews to administer it according to their own laws (cf. 1 Kin. 20:34; 2 Kin. 14:22). This is precisely what this decree established (Ezra 7:12–26). The decree also authorized the rebuilding of the city (see “The Decree of Artaxerxes I as Fulfillment of Daniel 9:25,” p. 584). The seventy weeks were to carry forward until the Messiah (the “Anointed One,” the Prince or Ruler).

The seventy weeks are divided in the prophecy into three segments: seven weeks, sixty-two weeks, and one week. In the fulfillment of the prophecy, seven weeks or forty-nine years extended from 457 to 408 B.C. This time period was allotted to the rebuilding of the city and the wall. Some English versions follow the punctuation of the Masoretes, a group of Jewish scholars who worked between the sixth and tenth centuries A.D., that places a full stop after “seven weeks,” thereby making “the Messiah,” “the Prince” come at the end of the seven weeks. However, we must remember that the Masoretic punctuation was introduced into the text about six hundred years after the Christian era and is not part of the original text. Theodotion, who around A.D. 150 translated the Hebrew Bible into Greek, reads “seven weeks and sixty-two weeks.” In any case, the seven weeks and sixty-two weeks are included together in the following verse, and v. 25 cannot be taken to imply that the Messiah was to come after 49 years—the next verse indicates that He was to be cut off after the 483 years.

The sixty-two weeks or 483 years extended from 408 B.C. to A.D. 27, when the Messiah was to appear. In A.D. 27, Jesus was about thirty years old (Luke 3:23) because He was born about four to five years before A.D. 1.

The Roman abbot, Dionysius Exiguus, who in 532 established the Christian era, miscalculated the birth of Christ by at least four years. The time of Jesus’s baptism and anointing was the fifteenth year of Tiberius Caesar (Luke 3:1); it was also the beginning of the last week of the seventy weeks. Tiberius became emperor in A.D. 14. According to the Syrian method of computing regnal years, his fifteenth year would have commenced in September/October A.D. 27 when Jesus was baptized.

In A.D. 31, in the middle of the last week of seven years, the Messiah would be executed—literally “cut off.” When Jesus died, type met antitype (Ex. 12:21; 1 Cor. 5:7), the veil in the temple was torn in two from top to bottom (Matt. 27:50–51), and this event marked the end of the earthly ceremonial system. The terminology used indicates that, abandoned by all, he would experience a violent death (lit. “no one shall be for him”). This is an apt description of the experience of Jesus on the cross (Matt. 26:56; John 1:11).

Daniel 9:26 also tells us that the people of the prince/ruler who would come would destroy the city and the sanctuary. The prince and people mentioned here have been traditionally identified as Titus and his legions when the Romans sought to take Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Support for this view is found in Daniel 8:24, where the same verb (“to destroy”) is used to describe the work of the Romans. While this may be possible, it is also possible and contextually better to see this as referring to Jesus, the Messiah Prince mentioned in v. 25. The “people of the prince” who was to come refer to the people of the Messiah, that is, the Jews. History clearly indicates that the Romans under Titus destroyed Jerusalem and the temple. But the city and the sanctuary were destroyed because the Jews rebelled against the Romans and refused to surrender when, in A.D. 70, Jerusalem was surrounded by the Roman army. In this sense it could be said that the people of the Jewish Messiah caused the destruction of their city and temple. The description stating that the end would come like a “flood” fits well with the manner in which the Romans penetrated the defenses of Jerusalem in the summer of A.D. 70. The comparison of military forces to a flood occurs elsewhere in the Bible (e.g., Is. 8:7–8; Jer. 46:6–8; 47:2).

The next verse (Dan. 9:27) begins with the pronoun “He,” which is clearly referring to the Messiah of v. 26. If, in v. 26, the Prince/Ruler is Christ, then the “He” mentioned here in v. 27 would refer back to the Prince or Ruler who was to come and who, as the Messiah, would be executed. If the reference in v. 26 to the prince/ruler is to Titus, then the “He” of v. 27 would be a switching of antecedents back to the Messiah. It is helpful to consider the prince/ruler who is to come as the Messiah for it is grammatically consistent and helps explain why the futurist interpretation is faulty. Futurist interpreters see the Roman general Titus as the coming prince/ruler and do not consider the “He” of v. 27 to refer back to the Messiah but to the antichrist, in its final phase, in other words, the ten-toe phase of Daniel 2 and the ten-horned-beast phase of chapter 7. They believe the final antichrist will be involved in concluding this covenant with the people of God during the final seven years before Christ’s return. This view assumes a long gap of time between vv. 26 and 27, from Titus in the first century A.D. (v. 26) to a future Roman ruler, the antichrist, in the time of the end in v. 27. The text, however, does not support such a gap. Christ is the One who confirms the covenant in v. 27, and this is the best option here.

The Messiah would “confirm [strengthen] a covenant with many” in the sense of extending it to many people. The death of Christ ratified the covenant God made with His people (Matt. 26:28) and extended it to include Gentiles. This event, part of the seventy weeks, took place during the last week, in A.D. 34, at the end of which the theocracy formally came to an end and the faith of Israel was embraced by Gentile believers (see Acts 8 and 9). In the middle of the week, the death of the Messiah was to put an end to the sacrificial system (see John 4:21; Heb. 10:1, 9).

The last part of v. 27 is somewhat cryptic and has been translated variously: some indicate that a desolator was to be on “the wing of abominations,” others that someone was to “set up an abomination that causes desolation,” while others refer to the abominations to be placed at “a wing of the temple.” In all of these cases, the text is taken to be referring back to the desolation mentioned in v. 26, in other words, to the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple (see Matt. 24:15–16; Luke 21:20–22). The phrase “on the wing” might be used to indicate that, once the abominations were present, desolation would follow. However, now a new thought appears: at the eschatological end, the final destruction determined by God would be poured out on the one causing the desolation. The desolation would not be something that would happen only to Jerusalem but something that would be part of the Christian experience, even to or until the occurrence of the end/destruction that God has determined against the oppressor (cf. Is. 10:23). We detect here a connection to Daniel 8. The desolating power of Rome, in its pagan and Christian expressions, is mentioned in Daniel 8:24–25. The attack of the little horn against the Prince is called the desolating transgression (v. 13; cf. 11:31; 12:11, where it is called the desolating abomination). The Lord told Daniel that at the end the little horn would be broken but not by humans (8:25). This is what the Lord determined to do to the desolating power, and now 9:27 returns to the same idea. Daniel 9 takes us from the beginning of the 2,300 days/years to the very eschatological end when the little horn would be unmasked and the enemies of God and His people would be permanently defeated. The chapter closes with the proclamation of a victorious God.

10:1—12:13

KINGS FROM THE NORTH AND THE SOUTH

The last vision in the book of Daniel contains the most detailed prophecy of future events in the OT. We do well to remember, therefore, that the great prophecies in Daniel are given according to the principle of repetition and enlargement. These prophecies begin either in the days of Babylon (Dan. 2, 7) or Medo-Persia (Dan. 8, 10–12), but they each climax in the establishment of the kingdom of God. All these prophecies deal with the same powers; Daniel 7 enlarges the outline of Daniel 2, and Daniel 8 and 9 enlarge the outline of Daniel 7. We can expect, therefore, that the vision of Daniel 10 to 12 enlarges at least the outline of Daniel 8 (see “Interpreting Biblical Apocalyptic Prophecies,” p. 46).

10:1—11:2

Introduction to the Prophetic Speech

Daniel 10 to 12 form a unit with three main elements:

A Introduction—Daniel and Heavenly Beings (10:1—11:1)

Vision of Heavenly Man in Linen (10:4–14)

Dialogue—Daniel and Heavenly Being (10:15–21)

B Prophetic Speech (11:2—12:4)

A' Epilogue—Daniel and Heavenly

Beings (12:5–13)

Vision of Heavenly Beings

(12:5–6)

Dialogue—Daniel and Man

Dressed in Linen (12:7–13)

The introduction and conclusion of the book correspond to each other in terms of the visionary presence of heavenly beings and Daniel's dialogue with one of them. The man dressed in linen is presented in both chapters, which constitute a literary unit. The last vision of Daniel was given two years after the return of the Jews from Babylon. In this vision God lifted the veil of history and showed Daniel some of the realities of the unseen world—the conflict going on between the forces of good and evil. In Revelation 12:7–9, we find a similar picture: Michael and his angels fighting the prince of evil and his angels. Yet the outcome in both books is the same—Michael, the great prince, overcoming Satan and delivering His people.

10:1–9. Date and Vision of Heavenly Being.

The introduction dates the experience of Daniel to the third year of King Cyrus (536/535 B.C.). Daniel had been mourning and fasting for three weeks (v. 2). The reason for this is not given, though from v. 14 we can infer that the future of his people must have been of concern to him. Cyrus succeeded to the throne of Babylon in 538 B.C., and probably because of Daniel's witness, Cyrus had come to know the prophecies of Isaiah about himself (Is. 45:1–3, 13) and had already taken steps to fulfill them (Ezra 1:1–4; 6:3–5). At the end of the three weeks, Daniel received a vision by the Tigris River in which he was shown the Great Controversy between the spiritual forces in the universe. The conceptual connections between this description of the controversy and Daniel 8 to 9 are presented in "The Great Controversy in Daniel 8—12" (p. 1053).

In answer to Daniel's prayer, a celestial being appeared to him. A comparison of the words of Daniel 10:5–6 with Revelation 1:13–15 suggests that this divine Being was Christ, who is named Michael later in the chapter (Dan. 10:13, 21; 12:1).

Only Daniel saw the vision (10:7). This was a day vision, in contrast to night visions or prophetic dreams. The effect of this day vision on Daniel's companions is comparable to what happened when Jesus appeared to Saul on the Damascus road (Acts 9:3–7; 22:6–9). The physical effects of the vision on Daniel were similar to that of Balaam (Num. 24:2–4) and John (Rev. 1:17). Daniel, like Peter (Acts 10:9–11) and Paul (2 Cor. 12:1–3), was unconscious of his immediate surroundings. He was so fully absorbed in the things he was shown that he became a participant in the actions (Dan. 12:5–9; cf. Rev. 1:10; 5:4–5; 19:10; 21:5).

10:10–14. Behind the Scenes. At this juncture another angel came to Daniel and touched him (v. 10). Although this angel is not named, the way he addressed Daniel is similar to the way Gabriel spoke to him. It is a wonderful fact that a human being can be said to be the object of such regard by the Creator of the universe.

The heavenly being informed Daniel that he had come to respond to Daniel's words (v. 12). This gave Daniel confidence that his prayer would be answered. Gabriel then explained that while Daniel was fasting and praying, there was a struggle between the forces of good and evil to influence Cyrus's mind. God does not force, and neither does He allow Satan to force humans to act against their wills. The reference to the prince of Persia (v. 13) is primarily to Satan himself, who through his agents tried to turn the Medo-Persian ruler against Israel. Ezra 4:1–6 relates the events in the Holy Land, while in this chapter the veil is drawn back, and the supernatural powers of good and evil are seen engaging in the conflict concerning the rebuilding of the temple. Probably no other text in Scripture than Daniel 10:13 describes more clearly the struggle between the invisible powers that control and influence nations. Scripture indicates that even as God's angels carry out His purpose in the natural world (2 Sam. 24:16; Ps. 78:43–49) and in the moral world (Luke 15:10), so they also do in the political world. And just as Israel had a spiritual champion to protect her (Dan. 10:21), so the powers opposed to Israel had their demonic princes.

In order to understand the prophecy in chapter 11, Daniel 10:14 is particularly important. This text tells us that the vision is concerned with the future (lit. "days of the end" or "days afterwards"; see 2:28). Other nations are mentioned only as to their effect on the lives of God's chosen people, but the prophecy transcends geographic limitations and has cosmic dimensions.

10:15—11:1. Dialogue with Heavenly Being.

Daniel then describes his own subjective experience while in vision: he bowed with his face to the ground (v. 15). Again, he speaks of the complete loss of physical strength and of the supernatural strength received (v. 16). He also mentions a new feature: he stopped breathing (some translations interpret the literal description “no breath left” to mean that he had difficulty breathing). Twice in these verses, we read of the strengthening of Daniel (vv. 18–19). This time Daniel became a partner in dialogue with the heavenly being—Daniel sharing the reason for his reaction to the vision, and the angel speaking words of encouragement. Gabriel then predicted the struggle with the powers of Persia and their successors in the days of the Greek Empire (v. 20). He explained that he received no help from anyone, except from “Michael your prince.” “Michael” means “who is like God?” No one is like God except the

The Great Controversy in Daniel 8—12

Daniel 8		Daniel 9		Daniel 10–12
8:2	At the river Ulai			10:4	At the great river
8:3	I raised my eyes and saw, and behold			10:5	I lifted up my eyes and looked and behold
8:8	The large horn was broken—four horns toward the four winds of heaven			11:4	His kingdom was to be broken/divided toward the four winds of heaven
8:9	The little horn grew mighty—toward the Glorious/Beautiful Land			11:23	He was to become strong with few people
				11:16	The Glorious/Beautiful Land
8:11	The daily/continual ( tamid ) was taken away			11:31	Was to take away the daily/continual ( tamid )
8:11	God’s sanctuary was overthrown	9:26	Was to destroy... the sanctuary
8:11	The Prince/Commander of the host/army	9:25	An Anointed One, a Prince/Ruler	11:22	The prince of the covenant
8:13	The desolating transgression/rebellion	9:27	Desolating abomination	11:31	The desolating abomination
8:16	Gabriel was to explain the meaning of the vision	9:21–23	Gabriel came to help Daniel understand
8:17	Gabriel identified the vision as being for the time of the end	9:26	Until the end	11:35	Until the time of the end
8:19	The future time of anger			11:36	Until the anger would be finished
8:24	Destruction of the holy people	9:26	Destruction of the sanctuary
8:25	He was to oppose the Prince of princes	9:26	An Anointed One/Messiah was to be cut off/executed	11:22	The prince of the covenant would be killed
8:25	He would be broken/destroyed without human power (lit. “hand”)	9:27	Total destruction would be poured out on the desolator	11:45	He would come to his end
8:26	The vision: true			10:1	The word/message: true

Son of God (John 10:30), who intercedes for His people (Heb. 7:25; 1 John 2:1-2). Jewish literature describes Michael as the highest of the angels and identifies him with the “Angel of Yahweh,” who is frequently mentioned in the OT as a divine being (see Gen. 16:7-14; 22:11-18; 31:11-13; Ex. 3:2-6; 14:19; 23:20-23; Judg. 2:1-5; 13:2-23; Hos. 12:3-5; Mal. 3:1). This “Angel” (Ex. 23:23) was capable of pardoning or refusing to pardon transgressions, and God’s name was “in Him” (Ex. 23:21). Since forgiveness of sins is the prerogative of God (Ex. 34:7; Is. 43:25; Mic. 7:18; Mark 2:7), the conclusion is inevitable that God’s Angel or Messenger (Ex. 23:23) is a member of the Godhead. In this case “Angel” does not designate a creature but a function. One of the members of the Godhead is the Messenger of the Lord.

In Daniel 10:21, Michael is called “your prince,” in other words, the Prince of God’s people. In Isaiah 9:6, Jesus the Messiah is called the “Prince of Peace”; in Daniel 8:25, He is “the Prince of princes”; and in Daniel 9:25, He is identified as “Messiah the Prince/Ruler.” Thus, the conclusion seems justified that in the OT “Michael” is “the Angel of the Lord” or “My Angel,” who is also called “My Son” (Ps. 2:7).

11:2—12:4

The Prophetic Speech

Daniel 11 is the most difficult chapter of the book, and in some cases there are different interpretations among historicist expositors dealing with the historical fulfillment of the prophecy (we will discuss various Adventist views). Modern critical scholarship views Daniel 11 as a description of the wars between the Seleucid and Ptolemaic kings, culminating in the career of the Syrian king Antiochus IV Epiphanes, who is seen as the main actor in vv. 21-45 (see “The Little Horn and Antiochus IV,” p. 1039). Evangelical scholarship generally follows this outline, except that some see, starting with v. 35, the career of Antiochus IV Epiphanes foreshadowing the activities of the last-day antichrist; others have postulated a gap of many centuries between vv. 35 and 36 and interpret the last ten verses as applying only to a future antichrist. We see no need to inject such a huge time gap into the biblical text.

Although there are some differences among historicists on the interpretation of Daniel 11, there are five events within the prophecy that are fairly clear and straightforward; these can be used for interpretations based on the principle that Scripture interprets Scripture, with one passage being the key to other passages. First, at the beginning of Daniel 11, the angel referred to Persian and Greek kings. The reference to the mighty king (v. 3), whose kingdom was to be broken up toward the four winds (v. 4), was clearly a reference to the reign of Alexander the Great (336-323 B.C.). This is supported by parallelism with Daniel 8:8, where Alexander is the large horn that was broken and in whose place four other significant ones rose up toward the four winds of heaven. The four horns symbolize the Hellenistic kingdoms that emerged after the breakup of Alexander’s empire.

The next clearly identifiable event is the death of the Messiah in v. 22. The word for “prince” in this verse is nagid. It is used only in one other place in the book of Daniel, namely, in Daniel 9:25-26. In other places Daniel uses the similar word sar, “Prince”/“Commander” (8:11, 25; 10:13, 20, 21; 12:1). On linguistic grounds, therefore, the “prince of the covenant” in 11:22 is the same as the one who would confirm a covenant with many (9:25-27). Since Daniel 9:26-27 and 11:22 obviously refer to the crucifixion of Christ by the Romans, the Roman Empire is probably prophesied as entering the stage of history sometime prior to the prophecy in 11:22.

The third event is the taking away of the tamid (“daily”/“continual”) and the setting up of the abomination of desolation (11:31). The terminology used in 11:31 for this event is also used in 8:11, where it refers to the earthly priesthood taking away the intercessory ministration of Christ in the heavenly sanctuary. And the desolating abomination refers to the vast system of beliefs and practices of spiritual Rome, which led people away from the priestly ministry of Jesus for more than a thousand years. Thus, it appears that apostate Christianity is prophesied in this chapter in either v. 31 or before.

The fourth event that provides a chronological marker in the prophecy is the “time of the end” (11:40). This phrase is found only in the book of Daniel, once in Daniel 8:17 and four times in connection with Daniel’s last vision (11:35, 40; 12:4, 9). The visions of Daniel 8 and 11 both reach to “the time of the end,” at which point, according to Daniel 12:2, a resurrection will take place. Thus “the time of the end” is the time prior to the Second Coming (see v. 1). At the end of the vision, Daniel was told to close the book and seal it for “the time of the end” (v. 4). At that time knowledge of these visions would increase, and their meaning would be understood (v. 10).

The fifth event that is easily understood is the resurrection at the end of the vision (v. 2). We suggest that this resurrection includes a special resurrection that will occur immediately prior to the appearance of Jesus in the clouds of heaven and will be followed by the general resurrection of the righteous (v. 13). This interpretation seems warranted by the fact that some of the wicked will be raised at this special resurrection to witness the coming of Christ (Matt. 26:64; Rev. 1:7; cf. GC 637).

These five events provide the basic chronological outline for Daniel 11. All the other historical events mentioned in the chapter must fit into this framework. That this is by no means an easy task is shown by the various interpretations.

11:2–4. Medo-Persia and Greece. Gabriel told Daniel that three more kings would arise in Persia and that the fourth would be much wealthier than the others. At the time of the vision, Cyrus (559–530 B.C.) was the ruling monarch. The next four kings were Cambyses (530–522 B.C.), Gaumata or the false Bardiya/Smerdis (522 B.C.), Darius I (522–486 B.C.), and Xerxes I (486–465 B.C.). The last one was the king who married Esther. When his fleet was destroyed by the Greeks at Salamis (480 B.C.) and his army was defeated at Plataea (479 B.C.), the Persians gave up the idea of conquering Greece. About one hundred and fifty years later, the Greeks under Alexander the Great (336–323 B.C.) conquered Persia instead. After Alexander’s death the kingdom was eventually divided among four of his generals (see Dan. 7:6). Out of the divided Greek Empire arose two dynasties, the Seleucids and the Ptolemies, who became the kings of the north (the Seleucids in Asia Minor) and of the south (the Ptolemies in Egypt) in relation to their geographical proximity to the Holy Land.

11:5–39. Warring Kings of North and South. Adventist interpreters, with a few exceptions, generally identify in the first part of the chapter the king of the south as referring to the rulers of Egypt (south of Israel) and king of the north (11:5–6) as Syria (north of Israel). In Egypt, the Ptolemies ruled from 305 to 30 B.C. (Cleopatra VII, 51–30 B.C., being the last ruler of this dynasty). The kings of the Seleucid dynasty in Syria ruled from 305 to 65 B.C. Verses 5–13 and 15 describe the wars between these two countries. Both dynasties were eventually replaced by the Roman power.

Within the Seventh-day Adventist Church, a wide variety of interpretations have been applied to several details of this portion of Daniel 11. “Different Historicist Views on Rome and the Papacy in Daniel 11:5–39” (p. 1056) shows three of the interpretations, all of which are based on the historical-grammatical method used in the interpretation of prophetic chapters. The differences are based on the challenge of identifying some of the historical fulfillments of the prophecy. The differences among the various Adventist interpreters primarily concern the question, “At what points in the story do the Romans and the papacy enter the picture?” The table summarizes three views for Daniel 11:5–39.

Here we will provide a short commentary on each of the three positions summarized in “Different Historicist Views on Rome and the Papacy in Daniel 11:5–39” (p. 1056).

Position 1. According to this view, following the death of Jesus (v. 22; the fulfillment of the seventy weeks), v. 23 would take us back two hundred years to 161 B.C., when the Jews under the Maccabees made a pact with Rome against the Seleucids. Next, Rome under Augustus fought against the king of the south, the Ptolemies in Egypt (v. 25), and returned to their land with great riches (v. 28). Having incorporated Egypt into the Roman Empire, Rome turned against the holy covenant God had made with His people and destroyed Jerusalem in A.D. 70 (v. 28).

The ships from kittim are identified with the ships of the Vandals from Carthage who sacked Rome in A.D. 410. Although this word originally referred to Cyprus, it later was extended to include the Mediterranean Roman coastlands to the west of Israel. Verses 31 and onward contain a prophecy concerning the main actor—apostate Christianity, the spiritual king of the north—that would take away the tamid (“daily”/“continual”). On this view, the tamid refers to paganism, and the abomination of desolation refers to the power that apostate Christianity developed from A.D. 538 onward. A new power is introduced in v. 36, namely, the new king who would speak blasphemies against the God of gods. According to this view, this figure is identified with the atheistic power of France.

Position 2. This interpretation basically follows the previous one in the first section of the prophecy but has imperial Rome enter the prophecy in v. 16. The prince of the covenant who was to be broken (v. 22) is again Jesus, but from vv. 23 to 39 it sees the activities of spiritual Rome not in chronological but in topical order. This means that vv. 23–30 are about the military campaigns during the Crusades (eleventh to thirteenth centuries), followed by the subversion of the system of salvation in v. 31. The profaning of the temple/sanctuary fortress in v. 31 is interpreted as the attack of apostate Christianity on Christ's ministry in the heavenly sanctuary. Thus the tamid, "daily"/"continual," is not identified with paganism but with Christ's ministry that was taken away from Him and put in the hands of earthly priests (see 8:1–14). Martin Luther identified the desolating abomination in Daniel 11 with the papacy, its

Different Historicist Views on Rome and the Papacy in Daniel 11:5–39

Position 1		Position 2		Position 3
11:5	King of the South: Ptolemies in Egypt	11:5	King of the South: Ptolemies in Egypt	11:5–8	Rise of Christianity and papacy
11:6	King of the North: Seleucids in Syria	11:6	King of the North: Seleucids in Syria	11:9–10	Rise of papal supremacy
11:14	Rome conquers the Holy Land	11:16	Rome conquers the Holy Land	11:11–12	Avignon captivity, Renaissance, and Rationalism
11:20	Emperor Augustus	11:20	Emperor Augustus	11:13–25	Counter-Reformation, missionary expansion, wars, and persecutions
11:21	Emperor Tiberius	11:21	Emperor Tiberius
11:22	Prince of the covenant broken: Jesus crucified	11:22	Prince of the covenant broken: Jesus crucified	11:22	Persecution of God's people using the language of the experience of Jesus
11:23	Roman league with the Jews in 161 B.C.	11:23–30	The Crusades
11:29	Removal of the seat of the empire to Constantinople in 330			11:25–27	French Revolution—Napoleon and the Concordat (1801)
11:30	Ships of Cyprus ( kittim ): ships of the Vandals from Carthage attacked Rome	11:30	Ships from the western coastland helped in the last Crusade	11:28–39	Nonchronological report of a theological nature—denunciation of the corruption of the church
11:31	The daily: paganism; the abomination of desolation: the papacy	11:31	The daily: Christ's ministry in heaven; the abomination: the union of church and state
11:32–35	Papal persecution	11:32–35	Papal persecution
11:36	Self-exaltation and blasphemy of papal Rome	11:36	Self-exaltation and blasphemy of papal Rome
11:37–39	French Atheism

doctrines, and practices. In view of the parallelism between 8:11, where in prophecy the little horn took away the tamid, and 11:31, where again the tamid was to be taken away but in addition the abomination of desolation was to be set up, it is concluded that the power that would take away the tamid is also the power that would set up the abomination of desolation. This means that spiritual Rome and its unscriptural teachings constitute the fulfillment of these prophecies in history.

That many were to fall by sword and flame (11:33) describes the persecution of the people of God during the Middle Ages. The king that would exalt and magnify himself above every god (v. 36) corresponds to the activities of the little horn in Daniel 8:11, which was fulfilled by the display of the power and blasphemy of the apostate church in history.

Because this interpretation views the historical events described in vv. 23–39 in topical and not chronological order, the events in v. 31 were to occur before those described in vv. 23–29. The same is also true of position 1, which breaks the chronological sequence in v. 23 by going back two hundred years in history to the Jewish league in 161 B.C.

Position 3. This interpretation divides Daniel 11:5–39 into three sections based on the structure of the text. (1) The first is the emergence of the little horn. Daniel 11:5–13a describes the troubled period of the rise of Christianity and the beginning of alliances between the church and the state (Constantine, Clovis—see “The Union of Church and State,” p. 1033), the abuses and iniquities of Christian Rome during the Middle Ages, the Crusades, and the Inquisition. These were followed by a reaction from the other side: the Avignon captivity, the Renaissance, and the rise of Rationalism.

(2) The next section (11:13b–27), describes the process of persecution from its beginnings and development to its fall. This is the time of the wars of religion and of intensive persecution. This part of the vision can be applied to the St. Bartholomew’s Day Massacre and the intrigues of Henry IV’s conversion to Catholicism. This is the time of the development of foreign missions when the church, supported by the Jesuits, expanded to the whole world. This period ended with the dramatic blow of the French Revolution (the “wound”; cf. Rev. 13:12), which marked the fall of the persecuting power.

(3) In 11:28–39, the vision does not follow a chronological progression but focuses on the church’s opposition to God and His people.

The iniquity of the church is denounced (“the abomination of desolation” and the taking away of the tamid, “daily”/“continual,” from the heavenly sanctuary are mentioned). The perspective here is the eschatological Day of Atonement.

11:40–45. A Closer Look. This passage contains some unfulfilled prophecies. Christ counseled that full understanding often comes only after a prophecy’s fulfillment (John 14:29). This does not mean that we should not try to interpret a prophecy, but it certainly indicates that we should not be dogmatic on a position taken. The identification of the kings of the north and south in these six final verses of chapter 11 has been a matter of debate among Adventist interpreters, some of whom look for identifications of these kings in contemporary religiopolitical events within a given period in modern history. For example, at the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth centuries, Turkey (the Ottoman Empire) was identified as the king of the north, but the majority of Adventist interpreters now agree that the king of the north is the papacy. During the Cold War, communist Russia (the Soviet Union) was identified as either the king of the north or the south, who was in clear opposition to religion. With the fall of the Soviet Union, this interpretation is no longer viable. Israel itself was also, for a time, proposed as the king of the south. This approach is still being used by some who find in current events an anticipated fulfillment of Daniel 11:40–45. We will suggest that it would be better to connect this passage to the book of Revelation, where we seem to find a further expansion of the end-time prophecies of Daniel. Prophecy indicates that spiritual Babylon will be the final persecutor of the people of God and describes the final, deadly conflict of the church with the powers of darkness (Rev. 12–14).

The prophetic events in vv. 40–45 occur during the time of the end. The term “time of the end”—which appears five times in the book of Daniel (8:17; 11:35, 40; 12:4, 9)—is not found in any of the other OT books or in any extra-biblical Hebrew sources. The key to its meaning is found in the vision in Daniel 11. In the concluding part of this vision, a resurrection of the dead is prophesied to take place (12:2). It is this event that holds the key to the proper understanding of the expression “time of the end.” In Daniel 12:4, the prophet was told to shut up the prophecies and seal the book until the time of the end. Many will then intensively search the book of Daniel, and as a result the knowledge of these prophecies will increase. The expression "time of the end" in 12:4 refers back to "the time of the end" in 11:35, 40. In view of the larger context, "the time of the end" in these texts refers to the time preceding the resurrection of the dead in 12:2 that will happen at the Second Advent. This is also the meaning of 12:4. Prior to the end of history, people will study and search out the Danielic visions just as Daniel himself searched out the seventy-year prophecy of Jeremiah (9:2). From history we know that in the nineteenth century, after the end of the 1,260 years of Daniel 7:25, knowledge of the Danielic prophecies increased dramatically. It is reasonable, therefore, to conclude that the time of the end began with the end of papal dominance in 1798. This means that the events from Daniel 11:40 onward must be sought in the time between 1798 and the resurrection at the end of time.

In what follows, we offer a possible way of reading the closing verses of Daniel 11 that takes into consideration the connection between Daniel and Revelation. In Daniel 11:40-45, the king of the south is identified with Egypt. In Exodus 5:2, Pharaoh proclaimed his independence by asking who the Lord was that he should listen to His words. He declared that he did not know the Lord. This does not mean, of course, that he was not aware of the existence of the God of the Hebrews. It simply reflects the king's views that Yahweh was irrelevant to him, implying that he was only under submission to the gods of Egypt. Revelation 11:8 uses Egypt to signify that which is opposed to true religion. Thus, in Daniel 11:42 Egypt represents the nations that put all their trust in something other than the biblical God. These would include non-Christian religions and nations where secularism and atheism prevail. The spiritual Babylon of the last days was prophesied to defeat this anti-God power and overcome it through demonic agencies and spiritual deception (Rev. 13:13-14; 16:13-14), until even the most distant powers (represented by Libya and Ethiopia) were to be brought to submission (Dan. 11:43).

Verse 40 also says that the king of the south would attack the king of the north. Which power is symbolized by the king of the north? In the OT, Babylon was the king of the north and the enemy of the kingdom of Judah (e.g., Jer. 1:14-15; 4:6; 6:1, 22). In the book of Revelation, Babylon is a code name for spiritual Rome. Thus, the king of the north stands for the end-time spiritual Rome. This harmonizes with Daniel 11:36-39 where the king who would exalt himself also represents a spiritual Rome.

The king of the north, on his way to do battle with the king of the south, would pass through the Glorious/Beautiful Land, which represents God's people living during the time of demonic deception. While he was to overthrow many, Edom, Moab, and Ammon would escape. These nations no longer exist although their descendants do in the country of Jordan. Accordingly, we are not expected to understand this passage literally. In the OT, these nations were related to the Hebrew people but were all enemies of God's people (Edom from Esau; Moab and Ammon from Lot). God in His grace promised to save a remnant of them (cf. Is. 11:14). Through the Prophet Amos, God prophesied that all the Gentiles/nations having His name (Amos 9:12) would be part of the messianic kingdom. Thus, it could be suggested that Edom, Moab, and Ammon represent those who hear the call of Revelation 18:4 and come out of Babylon during the time of the end. The people of God are found in all Christian communities, and some are even found among the world religions. As we approach the end, the Lord is going to do a special work among those religions, and many adherents will join God's remnant people. Escape from Babylon is the same as finding refuge on Mount Zion (Joel 2:32).

The king of the north was to conquer the land of Egypt (Dan. 11:42), in other words, the king of the south, but this victory was only to be enjoyed for a short time because news from the east and the north was to frighten him (v. 44). The message troubling the king of the north could be the message of Revelation 18:1-4 that unmasks Babylon and proclaims its fall at the moment when it was apparently all-powerful. Another possibility is the announcement that the kings from the east were to march forth (Rev. 16:12) and engage in the spiritual battle at Armageddon (v. 16).

The chapter concludes with the statement that the king of the north would try to meet the challenge of the news from the east, but he would come to his end and no one would help him (Dan. 11:45); he would be defeated (see Rev. 16:17-21). In general, Seventh-day Adventists have held the fulfillment of vv. 40-45 to be yet in the future, and consequently any interpretation of this segment of the prophecy is tentative.

12:1-4. Michael Stands. The concluding portion of the vision in chapter 11 is found in 12:1-4.

It describes the final battle between the forces of God and the forces of Satan and the deliverance of the saints. When Christ appears in the clouds of heaven, the righteous dead will be delivered from their graves. Deliverance will come only to those found written in the Book of Life, the register of the redeemed, whose sins were forgiven by the blood of the Lamb and who now will enjoy the consummation of their salvation.

The chapter division between 11:45 and 12:1 is unfortunate, for the vision of chapter 11 ends in 12:4, not in 11:45. “That time,” which is mentioned in 12:1, is the time period just mentioned in the preceding verse. The first three verses of chapter 12 describe the end of the conflict that is discussed at length in chapter 11. At that time God determined that Michael was to “arise” or “stand up.” The word ‘amad, “to stand up” or “arise,” is used repeatedly in this long vision (11:2–4, 7, 16, 20–21). Each time it refers to a new king ascending to the throne or establishing himself as the new power. When Michael stands up, he will assume rulership. Jewish literature describes Michael as the angel who vindicated Israel against Satan’s accusations at the heavenly tribunal. Similarly, Christ is prophesied as vindicating His people in the final showdown.

Michael will stand up after completing His work in the heavenly sanctuary and the finishing of the pre-advent judgment. Since there will be no mediator before the Father, the door of mercy will be closed, and the time of trouble will begin (12:1; cf. Rev. 22:11). We are told that many people “who sleep in the dust of the earth” will awake to either eternal life or everlasting damnation (12:2). As mentioned before, this description is inclusive of a special resurrection of some righteous and wicked (Matt. 26:64; Rev. 1:7), which will occur shortly prior to the general resurrection at the Second Advent when only the righteous will be resurrected (Dan 12:13; 1 Thess. 4:16–17). The resurrection of the wicked will occur a thousand years later (Rev. 20:4–6).

The reference to those who were to lead or turn many to righteousness (lit. “justify”) and who were to shine like the stars (Dan. 12:3) is an encouragement to all who faithfully work for the Lord, often under the most difficult circumstances. There is no greater joy than seeing people change under the influence and power of the Holy Spirit. To see them in the kingdom will be a wonderful reward for God’s servants.

Daniel was told to seal the book/scroll until the time of the end. This indicates that “the time of the end” begins with the unsealing of the closed portions of Daniel. Concerning the time of the end, it was prophesied that many would run or move quickly back and forth. This does not refer to the inventions of cars or planes since the end of the nineteenth century. The Hebrew word used here is sometimes associated with searching (cf. Jer. 5:1; Amos 8:12; Zech. 4:10). When the book of Daniel is unsealed after the commencement of the time of the end, the knowledge regarding its prophecies will be increased.

12:5–13

EPILOGUE

Daniel was still by the Tigris River, where he was in 10:4. Now he overheard a conversation between two heavenly figures and eventually joined in (see chap. 10 for its literary connection with the epilogue). This passage parallels Daniel 8:13–14 in several ways: both take place beside a river, involve two anonymous heavenly beings, and ask the question “How long?” (12:6). This refers back to the vision in chapter 11. Gabriel had given Daniel this long explanation to help him understand what was to happen to God’s people in the future (10:14). This passage also has a number of linguistic and thematic parallels to Revelation 10.

Next, two other heavenly beings appeared, and one of them asked Michael, the man clothed in linen, a question that aimed at sharing more information with Daniel. The answer is that it would be for a time, times, and half a time and that the period would end when the power of the holy people would be broken completely. This defines the time of the end as that following the 1,260 years (three and a half times) of papal supremacy and persecution (see “Interpreting Biblical Apocalyptic Prophecies,” p. 46).

A new time prophecy is introduced in v. 11. The taking away of the tamid (“daily”/“continual”) is mentioned three times in the book of Daniel (8:11; 11:31; 12:11), but only in 12:11 is it connected to a time period (“From the time...1,290 days”). There are important parallels between Daniel 11:31 and 12:11. In both passages the taking away of the tamid (“daily”/“continual”) is associated with the setting up of the desolating abomination.

The two texts are clearly parallel and refer to the same events in history. Since 11:31 refers to the past, so must 12:11. In Daniel 8:11, we saw that the tamid ("daily"/"continual") refers to Christ's intercessory ministry that was usurped by the work of the priests through the mass and the confessional. By sacrificing Christ anew in every mass, Christ's heavenly ministry has been removed from view. Since the period of 1,290 is based on the prophetic period of 1,260 days, to which another month was added ( $1,260 + 30 = 1,290$ ), the year-day principle is to be used in its interpretation. The extra month points to the beginning of the prophetic events while the 1,260 years place the emphasis on the end of the period in 1798. Therefore, the process mentioned in this prophecy began in the sixth century ( $1798 - 1,290 = \text{A.D. } 508$ ). Using the historicist method of interpretation, the 1,290 years would have begun in A.D. 508.

Sometime before A.D. 508 or, as some historians claim, in A.D. 508, Clovis, the king of the Franks who had married the Catholic Burgundian princess Clotilda, became a Roman Catholic. All the other Germanic tribes who had dismantled the Roman Empire were Arians (see "The Union of Church and State," p. 1033) and were therefore in opposition to the pope in Rome. After his great victory over the Visigoths in A.D. 507, Clovis went to Tours in A.D. 508 to hold a victory celebration. According to Gregory of Tours, Clovis was dressed in the uniform of imperial officials. The Franks became the first civil power to join up with the rising Church of Rome. France, therefore, is called the oldest daughter of the Roman Catholic Church.

The joining of the civil and the religious powers (the Franks and the papacy) at that time was an important step in setting up the abomination of desolation, in other words, a religiopolitical system that cast truth to the ground and used force to enforce its religious teachings. It is one of the ironies of history that France, the power that helped the papacy at the beginning of the 1,290 years, was the same power that brought about its demise at the end of this time period. From history we know that the supremacy of the medieval church came to an end in 1798 when Pope Pius VI was taken prisoner by Napoleon's army.

Another new time prophecy is introduced in v. 12. No specific event is mentioned for the beginning of the 1,335 days/years, but it is an extension of the 1,290 days (a month and a half is added to the previous prophetic period:  $1,290 + 30 + 15 = 1,335$ ). The prophecy simply promised a special blessing to those who keep on waiting. Contextually, it is most probable that this prophetic period began at the same time as the 1,290 days. Unless the 1,335 days were to begin at the same time as the 1,290 days, they would be the only time prophecy in Daniel that has no historical starting point, which would be out of character with the other time prophecies in Daniel. Therefore, the 1,335 prophetic days ended in 1843. This time period is closely connected to the 2,300-year prophecy that ended in 1844. The 1,335 days and the 2,300 evenings and mornings respond to the same question, "How long?" (8:13; 12:6), and connect the two prophetic periods, after which there are no more time prophecies (Rev. 10:5-6). Those who lived at the time of the advent expectancy when the first angel's message (Rev. 14:6-7) was proclaimed in Europe and the Americas were blessed to see the fulfillment of prophecy. This message was then followed by the full proclamation of the messages of the three angels of Revelation 14:6-12 by God's end-time remnant (Dan. 12:17).

The connections between the epilogue of Daniel and chapters 7-11 are clear. For example, (1) since the little horn in Daniel 7 and 8 designates the same historical power, the removal of the tamid ("daily"/"continual") in 8:11 and 12:11 must refer to the same past historical event. (2) There is a strong thematic and linguistic connection between the texts in 7:25 and 12:7. The shattering of the power of the holy people in 12:7 was to last for three and a half times, the same as the persecution of the saints in 7:25 that also was to last for three and a half times. (3) The year-day principle is operative in all the time prophecies. The 1,290 and 1,335 days are prophesied as extensions of the 1,260 days mentioned in 7:25 and 12:7 as a time, times, and half a time. Because the periods of 1,290 and 1,335 days are based on the 1,260 days, and because the 1,260 days are years, the year-day principle is also applied to the 1,290 and 1,335 days.

The book closes with two messages for Daniel. He was exhorted to go on with his life until he would rest—a euphemism for death (cf. Job 3:13, 16, 26). However, death would not be the absolute end because he would rise to receive his inheritance in the general eschatological resurrection. The book closes with a return to the topic of hope that characterizes it. The forces of evil would oppose the divine plan and oppress God's people throughout history, but at the end they would receive, together with Daniel, their inheritance. In the context of the book, the inheritance is the kingdom of God. It will be theirs through the work of the Son of Man, the Messiah whose First Coming is clearly announced in Daniel 9, where He is described as a sacrifice and the high priest. At His Second Coming, His enemies and the corrupt kingdoms of the earth will be destroyed. This wonderful hope will be revealed in greater detail in the NT. Ultimately, it is humanity's only hope.

HOSEA

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The title of the book is the name of the author (Hos. 1:1). Hoshea' means "He [Yahweh] has saved" (shortened from hosha'yah "Yahweh has saved"; cf. Jer. 42:1; 43:2). This was also the name of Israel's last king (2 Kin. 15:30; 17:1–6), as well as of other figures in OT history (Num. 13:8, 16; 1 Chr. 27:20; Neh. 10:23). Joshua and Jesus are variations of the same name. Hosea's father was named Beerī, and his wife was named Gomer, daughter of Diblaim. He had three children: a son, Jezreel; a daughter, Lo-Ruhamah; and another son, Lo-Ammi. Nothing is known about Hosea's birthplace, but he probably came from the Northern Kingdom of Israel since he mainly addressed his prophecies to its people.

Date. Hosea addressed his message primarily to the last generation of the Northern Kingdom of Israel before its fall in 722 B.C. He prophesied during the reigns of four kings from the Southern Kingdom of Judah: Uzziah (= Azariah; ca. 792–740 B.C.), Jotham (ca. 750–732 B.C.), Ahaz (ca. 735–716 B.C.), and Hezekiah (ca. 716–687 B.C.; Hos. 1:1). The first verse mentions only one king of Israel (Jeroboam II; 793–753 B.C.), although six more kings reigned after Jeroboam II. These last six kings were probably omitted because the Lord did not appoint them (8:4). Hosea prophesied under more kings than any other prophet. His ministry probably lasted at least thirty-five years (ca. 760–725 B.C.).

Backgrounds. Hosea began his ministry during a period of great prosperity for the kingdoms of Israel and Judah. Jeroboam II, the third king in succession of the Jehu dynasty, brought Israel to the zenith of its power and enlarged its territory to the northern boundary it held under Solomon. King Uzziah likewise enlarged Judah's territory to the southern border of the united monarchy. During this time the Assyrians were preoccupied with foreign invasions to their north, while Egypt experienced a period of internal weakness. Israel and Judah were safe from their enemies and internally strong.

Commerce flourished in both Israel and Judah, bringing great wealth and luxury to the upper class. Excavations of Samaria, Israel's capital city, have revealed spacious ivory-inlaid palaces. Excavations in Judah's capital city, Jerusalem, have demonstrated great expansion and fortification. It was a time of external optimism and national pride. The people confidently expected a glorious future because they believed that God's election guaranteed their ongoing prosperity.

But it was also a time of internal sickness with a shocking disparity between the wealthy and the poor. The middle class all but disappeared, as is evidenced by excavations at towns like Tirzah (Tell-el-Farah). Those in power demonstrated heartless injustice, materialistic greed, and flagrant dishonesty. Society was rife with crime of every sort, feasting and drunkenness, gross licentiousness, debauchery, and corrupt religious practices. Jeroboam I had set up two golden calves at Dan and Bethel (1 Kin. 12:26–30), which became centers for the counterfeit and syncretistic worship of Baal (Hos. 2:8; 13:1), nominally carried out in the name of Yahweh. Baal worship involved gross immorality, including cultic prostitution, as part of worship.

After the death of Jeroboam II, the Northern Kingdom fell into chaos. They experienced a thirty-year period of political anarchy, a veritable revolving door of power (cf. 8:4). A series of political assassinations led to three different kings ruling within a period of one year. Shallum assassinated and supplanted Zechariah, and Menahem assassinated and supplanted Shallum. A decade later, Menahem's son, Pekahiah, was himself assassinated by Pekah. The political security of Israel and Judah began to crumble with the rise of the Neo-Assyrian Empire under Tiglath-Pileser III (also called Pul, 745–727 B.C.). During his first campaign into the Holy Land, he exacted a high tribute from Menahem (2 Kin. 15:19–20). He returned to the Holy Land in 734 B.C., when King Ahaz of Judah cried for help against King Pekah of Israel and King Rezin of Syria during the Syro-Ephraimite War (2 Kin. 15:37; 16:5–9; Is. 7). In 732 B.C., Tiglath-Pileser III conquered, exiled, and annexed the northern and eastern provinces of Israel, placed Hoshea on the throne, and reduced Judah to vassal status (2 Kin. 15:29–30). When Tiglath-Pileser III died, his son Shalmaneser V (727–722 B.C.) succeeded him. King Hoshea withheld tribute from Assyria, shifting his loyalty to Egypt. In response, Shalmaneser (via his general, Sargon II) besieged the city of Samaria for three years. The city finally fell in 722 B.C. Sargon II succeeded Shalmaneser, subdued the rest of the Northern Kingdom, and sent the populace into exile. The Prophet Hosea prophesied during this turbulent time in the history of Israel and Judah. His prophecies, apparently ordered in general chronological sequence from the 750s to the 720s B.C., probably allude to various details of the contemporary political chaos.

Theology and Purpose. Written in the last days before the destruction of the Northern Kingdom, the book of Hosea serves as God's "Laodicean message" (see Rev. 3:14–22) to the people. In an attempt to stop their national apostasy, God sent a personal, emotion-packed message calling for them to change their course. Hosea's wife, Gomer, was unfaithful to him, but he forgave and ransomed her out of enduring love. Their relationship became a dramatic life parable of Yahweh's steadfast love for unfaithful Israel.

1. God as the Source of All Blessings. Among the OT prophets, Hosea became the leading expositor of God's paradoxical outrage and heartbreak at Israel's participation in pagan fertility cults. The promiscuity/adultery motif and God's reaction to it appear repeatedly throughout the book. God, at the risk of being misunderstood, used unmistakable sexual imagery to counteract the distorted sexual theology and ritual of Baal worship. The book of Hosea describes the genuine love relationship between God and His people and affirms that the fertility of the people, the land, and the animals comes from the Lord.

The book presents a conflict between Baal and the Lord, who was unwilling to let Baal have Israel. The Lord was the exclusive source of all of Israel's blessings. He, not Baal, fertilized the land like the dew (Hos. 14:5). Although outside nature, the Lord acts within it. To a people obsessed with the fertility of the land, He presented Himself as an evergreen tree, unaffected by seasonal changes (v. 8). As Israel's Husband, He cared for His wife by bestowing upon her gifts from the land (2:5, 8).

2. Rejection of Divine Love. In Hosea, the history of Israel illustrates God's contemporary relationship with His people. The problem with the Northern Kingdom dated back beyond the rebellion of Saul (13:10–12) to the conquest of Canaan and Israel's first experience with Baal (9:10). Hosea uses these and other historical references (e.g., the Exodus, 2:15; 11:1; the desert wanderings, 2:3, 14; 9:10; 13:5; Jacob, 12:3–4, 12) to expose the present guilt of Israel and the Lord's struggle with His people. Throughout their history, the Lord had cared for and protected them (2:8), but they went after foreign lovers (vv. 5, 13). Israel acted like a stubborn son, who rejected the love and concern of his Father (11:1–6). Hosea also describes God as a Husband, vividly equating Israel's sin with harlotry, an image applied to both political and religious behavior (2:2–5; 3:3; 4:10–18; 8:9). The religious and political leaders had all been unfaithful to Israel's loving, divine Husband.

The priests encouraged national apostasy instead of teaching God's word (4:6, 8, 11–13). The political leaders committed intrigues and murders instead of consulting the Lord when appointing new kings (7:5–7; 8:4). They thirsted for power without any concern for the people. They also sought the assistance of Egypt and Assyria, physicians who could not heal (5:13; 7:8–11). In Hosea, sin is simply unfaithfulness. The Lord had been their loving Husband (2:2–20), their Father (11:1–6), and their healing Physician (7:1; 14:4). But the people committed adultery and abandoned Him (2:13; 4:10).

3. Everlasting Love. The key theme in the book is God's steadfast love (Heb. khesed) for His people and His passionate desire for an intimate love relationship with them. He wanted them to know (Heb. yada') Him on a personal level. They had gone after other lovers, but He longed for them to return/repent (Heb. shub) and to seek (Heb. baqash) Him again. Indictments (about two-thirds of the book) and threatened covenant curses (about one-fourth of the book) fill the extended legal case (Heb. rib) against God's wayward wife/son. Yet seven times God extended a promise of hope and salvation for His people in the eschatological future (1:10—2:1; 2:14–23; 3:5; 6:1–3; 11:8–11; 13:14; 14:1–8). Yes, He announced punitive judgment (1:5; 4:1–3; 5:7; 7:16; 8:3; 10:14), but that judgment constituted a loving act of a God striving for the love of His people. For change to come, the Lord would have to bring it about. He would cut off the way to the idols (2:6), bring Israel back to the wilderness (2:14), and remove all the perverted political and priestly institutions (3:4). He promised to heal their rebellious nature and love them freely if only they would return to Him (14:4). If this hope remained unrealized, it would not be because God stopped loving but because His unfaithful wife would not repent/return.

Literary Features. The book of Hosea is a literary masterpiece. Except for the narrative prose of chapters 1 and 3, it has an elegant poetic style. Hosea utilizes more figures of speech (metaphors, similes, wordplays, etc.) and makes more allusions to Israel's history than any other OT prophet. The Hebrew of Hosea's book also contains more obscure passages than that of any other prophetic book. The prophet probably spoke a distinct northern dialect of Hebrew.

The book comprises three main sections. The first section (chaps. 1–3) pictures Israel as God's wayward wife, as illustrated in the life parable of Hosea's marriage to Gomer. The matching final section (chaps. 11–14) portrays Israel as God's wayward son, whom God would finally bring home. The middle section (chaps. 4–10) forms an extended covenant lawsuit (Heb. rib) in which God presents the legal case against His people. The middle section contains five symmetrical subsections, forming an overall seven-part chiasmic mirror-image macrostructure.

- A God's Wayward Wife (chaps. 1–3)
- B Indictment for Spiritual Prostitution/Idolatry (4:1—5:7)
- C Indictment for Political and Cultic Unfaithfulness (5:8—6:11)
  - D Laments over Israel's Failure to Return to Yahweh (6:11b—7:16)
- C' Indictment for Political and Cultic Unfaithfulness (8:1—9:7b)
- B' Indictment for Spiritual Prostitution/Idolatry (9:7c—10:15)
- A' God's Wayward Son (chaps. 11–14)

Each of the seven sections of this macrostructure also contains internal chiasmic structuring, as shown in the commentary on each section. The chiasms in Hosea display traits generally true of any chiasmic structure. The central member often highlights the major emphasis of the section, and the second half of the chiasm reaffirms and amplifies the major themes of the first half in reverse order. Sometimes the first and last chiasmic members also serve to emphasize a major theme.

COMMENTARY

1:1—3:5

GOD'S WAYWARD WIFE

Chapters 1–3 use a life parable to illustrate the message of the whole book. God instructed Hosea to marry a harlot and have children. This relationship enabled the prophet to personally experience and communicate the pathos of God's relationship with His spiritually wayward wife, the people of Israel. These chapters form an ABA' pattern that alternates between narrative prose (chaps. 1, 3) and poetry (chap. 2).

1:1—2:1

Hosea's Unfaithful Wife and Their Children

Following the introductory verse of the book, the remainder of the first chapter (plus 2:1) forms a chiasmic structure:

Introduction Hosea's Promiscuous Wife

(1:2–3a).

A Jezreel ("God Sows"; 1:3b–5)

B Lo-Ruhamah ("Not-Shown-Mercy"; 1:6–7)

C Lo-Ammi ("Not-My-People"; 1:8–9)

D Israel Multiplied (1:10a)

C' Lo-Ammi Reversed (1:10b)

B' Lo-Ruhamah Reversed (1:11a)

A' The Great Day of Jezreel (1:11b)

Conclusion "Mercy" for "My People" (2:1)

1:2–3a. Hosea's Promiscuous Wife. Many have insisted that God did not actually ask Hosea to marry a harlot. But the Bible forbids only priests from marrying a harlot (Lev. 21:7), and Hosea was not a priest. The Hebrew word zenunim ("harlotry") normally refers to the actual status and practice of a harlot. Hosea 1:2 probably indicates that at the time Hosea married her, Gomer was either a common prostitute or one of the temple prostitutes of the fertility cult. These desperate times called for desperate measures on God's part. He involved Hosea in shocking actions as an attempt to wake up Israel before it was too late.

The reference to children of harlotry/promiscuity possibly refers to children Gomer had before marrying Hosea, but in the immediate context the phrase more likely reflects the promiscuity of the children's mother. God did not tell Hosea which harlot to marry. Hosea chose Gomer, whose name, ironically, means "perfection."

1:3b–9. Gomer's Three Children. Only the first of Gomer's children is explicitly referred to as the son of both Gomer and Hosea (1:3). The other two may have been born as a result of Gomer's prostitution (vv. 6, 8). Hosea named his first son Jezreel ("God sows") because of the bloodshed that occurred in the city of Jezreel when Jehu wiped out all the royal line of Ahab and Jezebel (v. 4; cf. 2 Kin. 9–10, esp. 9:22). Although carrying out God's behest (2 Kin. 10:30), Jehu was motivated by bloodthirsty self-interest and pride (2 Kin. 10:16, 31). The Hebrew word paqad, sometimes translated as "avenge" or "punish," literally means "visit" (Hos. 1:4). Jezreel may epitomize how God's "visitation" brings an end to dynasties and kingdoms. God would break the bow of Israel in the Valley of Jezreel (v. 5), the same location where He once broke the bow of Israel's enemies (see Judg. 6–7). Tiglath-Pileser III probably fulfilled this prophecy when he took away the northern and eastern territories of Israel (ca. 732 B.C.; see 2 Kin. 15:29).

Gomer's second child was a daughter. God told Hosea to name her Lo-Ruhamah ("Not-Shown-Mercy"; Hos. 1:6). Because of Israel's persistent covenant faithlessness, God would no longer show them mercy. The Hebrew word nasa' can mean "take away," "forgive," or "bear." The last clause may mean that God could no longer bear or forgive them. But since v. 6 matches v. 11, which prophesies the gathering of Israel and Judah, it probably means Israel would be taken away into captivity.

God commanded Hosea to name Gomer's third child, another son, Lo-Ammi ("Not-My-People") as a sign of covenant breaking. The final line of v. 9 reads literally "I am no longer 'I Am' to you." God called Himself by the name "I Am" (Heb. 'ehyeh) in Exodus 3:14. God would withdraw His very name from Israel.

1:10—2:1. The Eschatological Restoration of Israel. In the first of seven passages addressing eschatological hope and salvation, God promised to ultimately fulfill the covenant promises by restoring Israel from exile with an innumerable posterity (1:10a; cf. Gen. 13:15; 22:17; Lev. 26:9, 45; Deut. 30:5). In the eschatological future, He would undo the curses represented by Gomer's children, listed in reverse order. "Not-My-People" would once again be His people (Hos. 1:10b). "Not-Shown-Mercy" would once again receive His mercy. He would gather them together in a new exodus from the land of their exile (v. 11a; cf. 2:15). The great day of Jezreel would once again unite both Israel and Judah under one ro'sh ("head," "ruler," "leader"), an allusion to the coming Davidic Messiah (1:11b; see 3:5).

This prophecy looks ahead to the last days (3:5), which according to the NT began when Jesus came to earth (Heb. 1:2). Paul claims that the faithful remnant of Israel, including believing Gentiles, fulfills Hosea 1:10 (along with 2:23) when they accept Jesus as the Messiah (Rom. 9:25–26). This section concludes with the reunion of Israel, a complete reversal of the fortunes symbolized by Gomer's children (Hos. 2:1).

2:2–23

Yahweh's Covenant Lawsuit against His Unfaithful Wife

Hosea 2:2–23 introduces the covenant lawsuit that occupies much of the book (see "Covenant Lawsuit in Hosea," p. 1066). Hosea's relationship with his promiscuous wife, Gomer, illustrates the formal trial proceedings. While this chapter applies primarily to God's case against Israel (see v. 13), it also pertains to Hosea's relationship with Gomer (and to broken marriages even today).

- A The First Punishment: Removal of the Land's Fertility (vv. 2–5a)
- B The Second Punishment: Restraints on Israel (vv. 5b–7)
- C The Third Punishment: Reclaiming Gifts Attributed to Baal (vv. 8–13)
  - D Wooing Israel Back (vv. 14–15)
- C' Reversal of the Third Punishment: Removal of Baal's Name (vv. 16–17)
- B' Reversal of the Second Punishment: God's Marriage to Returning Israel (vv. 18–20)
- A' Reversal of the First Punishment: Restoration of the Land's Fertility (vv. 21–23)

2:2–13. Three Indictments and Punishments.

In v. 2 God calls for His wayward wife to immediately remove the outward signs of her prostitution (e.g., amulets and other jewelry worn in connection with the fertility cult; see v. 13). A broken marriage cannot mend without the offending party being held accountable and taking concrete steps to separate from promiscuous practices. If His wayward wife remained unfaithful, God would invoke the legal ultimatum—public exposure (v. 3). In a shame-based society (see v. 5), stripping a woman bare and publicly exposing her constituted the ultimate punishment (see Ezek. 16:37; 23:29). Historically, this means the land would be stripped and the people taken into exile in fulfillment of the predicted covenant curses (Lev. 26:31–33; Deut. 28:38–42). The common people would not escape either because they had also participated in the Baal cult (Hos. 2:4–5a).

Verses 5b–13 provide further evidence against Yahweh's wife, focusing on her spiritual harlotry and worship of Baal. God quotes her own words as testimony against her (v. 5b). This testimony reveals the basic theological tenets of the Baal fertility cult, which regarded the land as a female deity and Baal as the storm god who impregnated her with his semen (i.e., the rain fertilizing the land). Yahweh turned Baal theology upside down, presenting Himself as the Provider of fertility and Baal as sterile (vv. 8, 12).

God pronounced two formal sentences against His wife for her adulterous actions, each prefaced by the word “therefore” to emphasize His intention to actually mete out the sentence. The first

Covenant Lawsuit in Hosea

The Hebrew word rib (used as a verb twice in Hos. 2:2 and as a noun once in 4:1) is a technical term for “covenant lawsuit” or “investigative judgment.” In the Hebrew Bible, it occurs forty-four times in reference to a divine lawsuit, either a negative judgment (condemnation) or a positive judgment (vindication) of God's people. Hosea 2 involves both. The basic structure of the covenant lawsuit mirrors the regular covenant-making procedure in Scripture and in the ancient Near East (esp. Hittite suzerain-vassal treaties). The basic structure of a covenant in the ancient Near East normally contained the following elements:

1. List of witnesses
2. Preamble (introduction of the suzerain and call to judgment)
3. Historical prologue (review of the suzerain's benevolent acts toward the vassal)
4. Indictments or charges (evidence of covenant violations investigated)
5. Verdict and sentence (either condemnation or vindication)

The complete structure of this lawsuit pattern occurs in Hosea 4:1–13 (see also Deut. 32; Josh. 24; Is. 1:2–20; 3:13–15; Jer. 2:4–13; Mic. 6:1–8). Scripture contains over three hundred references to a divine covenant lawsuit. Condemnation resulted in the pronouncement of covenant curses/punishments (cf. the twenty-seven different kinds of covenant curses/punishments summarized in Lev. 26:14–39 and Deut. 28:15–68). Vindication resulted in the pronouncement of covenant blessings (cf. Lev. 26 and Deut. 4, 28, 30, 32).

Hosea 2 contains a partial formulation of the covenant lawsuit pattern. In v. 2 the children of the adulterous wife are called as witnesses to her promiscuity. As applied to the relationship between Yahweh and Israel, the children probably represent the common people, the individual members of the nation, while the mother represents Israel's upper-class leaders who are responsible for the nation's unfaithfulness to Yahweh. Most of the lawsuit in chapter 2 involves indictments and the verdict and sentence. The covenant curses (vv. 2–13) and blessings (vv. 14–23) are taken largely from Leviticus 26 and Deuteronomy 27–28 (see “God's Judgment in the Prophets,” p. 981).

The covenant lawsuit in this chapter resembles the adultery trial proceedings described in Numbers 5:12–31 and conducted by God in Ezekiel 16 and 23. In Hosea 2:2, God's statement regarding Israel probably signifies the broken relationship and not yet actual divorce. This divine lawsuit, like many others in Scripture, aims to both correct (in the immediate situation) and restore (ultimately).

sentence was a preliminary attempt to save the relationship: God would block her way with a hedge of thorn bushes to prevent her from finding her lovers (v. 6). Historically, the Assyrian domination of the northern and eastern parts of Israel (ca. 732 B.C.; see Hosea: Introduction), which thwarted Israel's participation in the Baal cult located there, probably fulfilled this prophecy.

The second sentence predicts the captivity and Exile of Israel after the fall of Samaria in 722 B.C. Yahweh's wife would refuse to return to her Husband, so He would take back His gifts that she considered to be rewards from her lovers (v. 12). He would uncover (galah) her lewdness (nablot, which probably refers to the female genitalia) in the sight of her lovers (v. 10). The Hebrew galah also means "go into exile." Hosea plays on the double meaning of the word to predict Israel's Exile and shameful exposure in the process. Yahweh would realize the covenant curses by making the land barren (Lev. 26:20; Deut. 28:39–40) and canceling Israel's entire cultic calendar—pilgrim festivals, new moons, and ritual sabbaths (Hos. 2:11; Lev. 26:31). Israel had forgotten Yahweh (Hos. 2:13), so the marriage was over.

2:14–23. Wooing Israel Back and Reversal of the Three Punishments. Verse 14 begins with a third "therefore." But instead of pronouncing the expected further punishment, Yahweh defies all logic by announcing that He would patah ("allure," "persuade," "woo," "court") Israel back to Himself. This is the second of seven passages of eschatological hope and salvation in the book. Eventually Israel would willingly choose to return to Yahweh (vv. 15–23). The Great Reversal employs language from Israel's Exodus from Egypt, recalling the joyful desert days when God tenderly spoke comfort to Israel (lit. "spoke to her heart"; v. 14). The Exodus, wilderness wandering, and settlement in the promised land prefigure the re-betrothal and remarriage of Yahweh and Israel. The Valley of Achor (lit. "trouble"; located southwest of Jericho), where Achan and his family were stoned for their sin (Josh. 7:26), would become a door of hope when the divine Groom brings His new bride home. The singing/responding (Hos. 2:15) may allude to the Song of Moses after the crossing of the Red Sea (Ex. 15). The Hebrew word 'anah can mean "sing" as well as "answer" or even "[sexually] respond." God promised to revirginize Israel, as it were, bringing His bride back to the intimacy, ardor, and covenant relationship of her youth. Such actions toward an adulterous wife engender hope for any marriage, even one scarred by unfaithfulness. But both parties must be willing to reconcile and start anew.

The phrase "in that day" in Hosea 2:16 looks forward to a future eschatological fulfillment. God promised to reverse the three punishments announced in vv. 2–13. First, instead of focusing on Baal and the gifts attributed to him, Israel would have his name totally removed from their vocabulary and memory. Playing on the twofold meaning of Baal—the name of the fertility god Baal and a word denoting a husband (lit. "master")—God promised that Israel would not only forget the god Baal but would also no longer call Yahweh Himself ba'ali ("my Master"), which implies ownership or possession. Instead, they would call Him 'ishi ("my Husband"), which implies an intimate, personal partnership. Thus, God would take a new marriage name, a common feature in the ancient sealing of a marriage covenant.

Second, instead of restraining His wife, Yahweh would remarry her (vv. 17–20). Using language reminiscent of the peace in the Garden of Eden before sin (Gen. 1–2) and of the divine covenant made with the earth after the Flood (Gen. 9:8–17), Yahweh promised to betroth Israel to Himself forever. Instead of the normal dowry, God offered to bestow upon her His own character qualities: His righteousness (Heb. tsedeq), justice (mishpat), steadfast love (khesed), compassion (rakhmim, lit. "womb love"; derived from rekhem, "womb"), and covenant faithfulness ('emunah; related to "amen"). This language reflects God's self-revelation in Exodus 34:6–7. These marriage gifts climax with the promise that Israel would know the Lord. The Hebrew word yada' ("know") often refers to a deep personal relationship, even sexual intimacy.

Third, Yahweh promised to reverse the first punishment by restoring the land's fertility. Hosea 2:21–23 describes the entire agricultural cycle, which would cause the land to burst with new life. The word 'anah, as noted above, may not only refer to various parts of the ecosystem participating in the antiphonal responding/singing during the wedding festivities. It may also have sexual connotations. Ultimately, Yahweh would sow/plant (zara') Israel for Himself in the earth (v. 23). The Hebrew zara' alludes to the name Jezreel ("God sows") but can also have sexual connotations. Biblical and ancient Near East thought compared the insemination of a woman with a man's seed to sowing a field. Obviously, God is above the sexuality depicted among the pagan gods, and this passage does not refer to actual sexual relations. Nonetheless, God used sexually charged language to describe His intimate personal relationship with His eschatological bride!

In the end-time restoration of Israel, God would have mercy on His people, another allusion to the reversal of the name lo-ruhamah (“Not-Shown-Mercy”; v. 23). The wedding ceremony would end with another name change, this time the bride’s. Both Paul (Rom. 9:25) and Peter (1 Pet. 2:10) point to the Israel of faith, comprising all who place their trust in Jesus the Messiah, whether Jew or Gentile, as the fulfillment of this verse.

3:1–5

Taking Back the Unfaithful Wife

- A Hosea’s Love for Gomer (v. 1)
- B Gomer Bought Back (v. 2)
  - C Gomer Restricted from Harlotry and Sex (v. 3)
  - C’ Israel Restricted from Court and Cult (v. 4)
- B’ Return of Israel (v. 5a)
- A’ Fearing Yahweh and His Goodness (v. 5b)

3:1–3. Gomer’s Return to Hosea. Verses 1–3 recounts the rest of Hosea and Gomer’s story. In contrast to the third person account of chapter 1, Hosea now narrates in the first person to enhance the sense of intimacy. Although some have denied that this woman was Gomer, the context clearly assumes a specific woman already known, and the description of this adulterous woman matches that of the promiscuous Gomer in chapter 1. The adverb ’od (“yet,” “again”) probably does double duty in 3:1. God told Hosea to go and love “yet again.” Hosea’s relationship with Gomer is a life parable, as he compares his love for Gomer, despite her promiscuity, with God’s love for Israel, despite her spiritual harlotry/idolatry.

Hosea bought Gomer for fifteen shekels of silver and one and a half homers (lit. “one homer and one letek”) of barley (v. 2). The shekel weighed about six ounces (170 g), and a homer held about ten bushels (about 87 gal or 330 l). The letek probably measured half a homer. The fact that Hosea had to piece together silver and barley (the cheapest flour) may indicate how much he had to sacrifice to purchase Gomer. When Gomer came home, he insisted that she stay at home with him for many days without sexual intercourse, neither with her former lovers nor with himself. This may represent a time of purifying and probationary deprivation.

3:4–5. Israel’s Eschatological Return to God.

Like Gomer, Israel would go through many days of purification, a period of exile that would deprive them of king and cult. The matsebah (variously translated as “sacred pillar,” “pillar,” “sacred stones,” “image”) was a phallic symbol used in the fertility cult. The ephod and teraphim (“household idols/gods”) were used in pagan divination (see Ezek. 21:21; Zech. 10:2). Hosea 3:5 has a chiasmic arrangement:

- A “Afterward”
- B Returning and Seeking Yahweh
  - C Seeking David, the (messianic) King
- B’ Fearing Yahweh and His Goodness
- A’ “In the Latter/Last Days”

This verse serves as the climax of the entire first section of the book. It clarifies that Israel’s promised restoration would have an eschatological fulfillment (see Deut. 4:29–30). This is the third of seven passages of eschatological hope and salvation in the book. As elsewhere, God called for His people to perform two major actions—return/repent (Heb. shub) and seek (Heb. baqash) Him. The people would respond to the Lord and His goodness/blessings with fear/awe/trembling. The center of the chiasm reveals the Christocentric focus of the book: Israel would one day seek the Messiah, the Davidic King (Is. 9:1–7; 11:1–9; Jer. 23:5–6; 30:9; Ezek. 37:15–25; Amos 9:11–12; Mic. 5:2–5). As already discussed, this began when Christ first came and will reach its consummation when Christ returns and the faithful Israel of all ages will receive the complete fulfillment of Hosea’s restoration promises (Rev. 3:7–13; cf. PK 298–300).

4:1—10:15

GOD’S COVENANT LAWSUIT AGAINST ISRAEL

4:1—5:7

Indictment for Spiritual Prostitution and Idolatry

Hosea 4:1—5:7 begins Yahweh’s formal covenant lawsuit (Heb. rib) against Israel. He summoned His people to court, examined the evidence, found them guilty of violating His covenant stipulations set forth in the Torah (esp. the Decalogue), and sentenced them to receive the covenant curses. In contrast to the sevenfold structure of most other sections of the book, this section has a fivefold structure, perhaps in conscious parallel to the five books of the Torah. It does not include a historical prologue or witnesses, possibly because these elements occur in chapter 2.

- A God's Legal Case (rib) against Israel:
Basic Indictments and Covenant Curses
(4:1–3)
- B Condemnation of Priests and People: A Hopeless Situation (4:4–10)
- C Israel's Harlotry (4:11–14)
- B' Condemnation of the People: A Hopeless Situation (4:15–19)
- A' God's Legal Case against Israel: Indictments and Imminent Judgment (5:1–7)

4:1–3 (A). God's Legal Case (rib) against Israel: Basic Indictments and Covenant Curses. Hosea 4:1–3 constitutes a virtual paradigm of Hosea's whole message. In v. 1, God lists Israel's basic sins of omission. They lacked the essential character qualities of Yahweh, 'emet ("faithfulness," "truth") and khesed ("mercy," "steadfast love"; see Ex. 34:6), and did not know/acknowledge (Heb. da'at) Him. These sins of omission broke the first four commandments. Hosea 4:2 delineates their sins of commission, which broke at least five commandments: swearing/cursing, lying, killing, stealing, and committing adultery. Verse 3 describes the destruction of the three categories of animals in the Creation account, listed in reverse order. The divine sentence constituted a reversal of Creation.

4:4–10 (B). Condemnation of Priests and People: A Hopeless Situation. Hosea 4:4–10 focuses on the priests who, along with the prophets, stumbled in their sin (v. 5; cf. 5:5). Hosea pinpoints the underlying problem of both leaders and nation: they lacked knowledge (i.e., a personal relationship with God) and forgot/ignored God's Torah (4:6; cf. 5:4). Forgetting is not amnesia but failure to act in harmony with God's covenant by obeying His law. In response, God would shakakh ("forget"; i.e., ignore or not act in favor of) their children (cf. chaps. 1–3, where "mother" and "children" represent Israel). The priests, chosen to make atonement for sin, instead increased sin.

They enriched themselves by encouraging the people to bring more sacrifices.

4:11–14 (C). Israel's Harlotry. The major theme of Hosea 4:11–14, the center of this section's chiasm, concerns the immorality and spiritual harlotry (idolatry) Israel committed by participating in the fertility rituals of the Baal cult. The entire section of 4:1–5:7 contains a twelvefold repetition of the Hebrew root for prostitution/harlotry (znh), the root of ruakh for zenunim ("[spirit of] prostitution"; 4:12; 5:4), zanah ("to act as a prostitute"; 4:10, 12–15, 18; 5:3), and zonah ("prostitute"; 4:14). Other terms referring to committing adultery, such as na'ap (4:2, 13–14) and qedeshah ("ritual or temple prostitute"; 4:14), reinforce this emphasis.

Verse 11 contains a proverb that links harlotry/prostitution to wine and new wine (cf. v. 18), which laqakh ("take," "seize," "take away") the leb ("heart," "mind," "understanding"). This means they all cause either addiction or loss of understanding/judgment. In the days of Baal-Peor, the use of wine "beclouded the senses and broke down the barriers of self-control" (PP 454; cf. Num. 25:1–3). Likewise, in Hosea's day, it led to immorality (qalon, "shameful lewdness"; Hos. 4:18) in the Baal cult.

Verses 13–14 describe the heart of the fertility cult rituals. According to Canaanite theology, since the sperm (rain) of Baal fertilized the land (see commentary on 2:2–13), his sexual activity must be stimulated. Worshipers engaged in ritual intercourse with the shrine devotees (male and female ritual prostitutes) in order to emulate and stimulate the sexual activities of the gods. Hence, cultic groves on the sacred mountaintops, seemingly upon every high hill and under every significant tree (Jer. 2:20; 3:6; cf. Deut. 12:2; 1 Kin. 14:23; Is. 57:5, 7), became scenes of the most degraded sexual debauchery—all under the guise of worship.

God held the fathers particularly responsible because they apparently encouraged their daughters to join them in these sexual orgies (Hos. 4:14). This verse, a landmark in moral history, insists that men are no less responsible for faithfulness to their marriage vows than women are.

4:15–19 (B'). Condemnation of the People: A Hopeless Situation. Hosea 4:15–19 matches vv. 4–10. Yahweh warned the Southern Kingdom of Judah, which did not yet completely participate in Baal worship, to avoid coming up to the Northern Kingdom's cult centers (v. 15).

"Beth Aven" is probably a slur on the name Bethel, where Jeroboam erected one of the two golden calves (1 Kin. 12:26-29). The Hebrew word 'aven ("wickedness") is substituted for el ("God").

The animal simile of Hosea 4:16 compares Israel to an obstinate heifer that forced Yahweh to let it range free. In one of the saddest verses of the entire book, God commanded that Ephraim be left alone (v. 17). He recognized that Ephraim (a synonym for the Northern Kingdom of Israel) had become addicted to (Heb. khavar, lit. "join") idols. This resulted in the dissolution of the marriage between Yahweh and Israel implicit in 2:9-13.

5:1-7 (A'). God's Legal Case against Israel: Indictments and Imminent Judgment. Hosea 5:1-7 matches 4:1-3. God indicted Israel, especially the political leaders, for prostitution (5:4). The leaders had not protected Israel, their intended function, but had instead hunted the people down and captured them (vv. 1-2). The ga'on ("pride," "exaltation," "arrogance") of Israel probably refers to Yahweh, the true Leader Israel had rejected, but some translators understand it to refer to Israel's arrogant attitude (v. 5; 7:10). The indictment declares the whole nation tame' ("corrupt," "defiled"; 5:3), having bagad ("acted treacherously", "faithlessly") against Yahweh while continuing with formalistic sacrifices. Consequently, when they sought Yahweh, they would find that He had withdrawn from them as a result of their choice (vv. 6-7a). They were children of apostasy (lit. "alien," "pagan," or "illegitimate" children), and their New Moon festivals (when the moon is dimmest) represented darkness enveloping the land (v. 7b).

5:8-6:11A

Indictment for Political and Cultic Unfaithfulness

- A The Alarm Raised in Benjamin (5:8-9)
- B Social Injustice in Judah and Ephraim (5:10-11)
- C Judah and Israel Torn to Pieces by God (5:12-15)
- D Israel's Repentance and Healing/Resurrection (6:1-3)
- C' Judah and Israel Cut to Pieces by God's Prophets (6:4-6)
- B' Social Injustice in Ephraim (6:7-9)
- A' The Horrible Thing in Israel (6:10-11a)

5:8-9 (A). The Alarm Raised in Benjamin. The Syro-Ephraimite War of 734-732 B.C. probably forms the background of Hosea 5:8-9 (see Hosea: Introduction). The Israelites blew a ram's horn (shopar) to warn of invasion by an enemy force and/or to rally troops for battle. The towns mentioned are all in the territory of the tribe of Benjamin, situated on the often-disputed border between Israel and Judah (see 1 Kin. 11:31, 35; 12:21; 2 Chr. 11:12-13). Since the towns are mentioned from south to north, these verses probably describe the attack of Judah upon Israel after the failure of the Syro-Ephraimite coalition, when Judah may have secured its northern defenses by recapturing the land of Benjamin.

5:10-11 (B). Social Injustice in Judah and Ephraim. Ultimately, both Judah and Ephraim had transgressed by committing acts of social injustice (vv. 10-11). In this context, the Hebrew tsaw (usually "a command" or "precept") is probably a slang expression for "excrement," "vomit," or "filth of drunkenness" (the variety of renderings in translations includes "worthless," "filth," and "idols") denoting the depths of degradation to which the two nations had sunk.

5:12-15 (C). Judah and Israel Torn to Pieces by God. Verse 12 compares the divine judgment upon Judah and Israel to 'as (often translated as "moth," but in this context it probably refers to "putrefaction" or "pus") and to raqab ("rottenness," "decay"). Maggots have infected the putrefied wound (v. 13; the Hebrew word mazor occurs only here and in Jer. 30:13) and have begun to devour the flesh (cf. Job 13:28), probably alluding to the wounds Israel and Judah inflicted upon each other in the aftermath of the Syro-Ephraimite War. The king referred to in this verse is probably Tiglath-Pileser III. The Hebrew, sometimes translated as "King Jareb," may read malekh rab ("great king"). This would parallel the Akkadian sarrûrabû, a title for the Assyrian kings that had the same meaning (cf. 2 Kin. 18:19). Any appeal to Assyria was in vain. Far from providing a cure, Assyria would become the rod of Yahweh's wrath, destroying Israel and subjugating Judah as a vassal state.

Hosea 5:14-15 describes the stages of a lion's hunt, including the lion capturing and killing the prey, tearing up the carcass, and dragging it away to his den to eat. The imagery of the lion, also used by other prophets (Is. 5:26-30; Nah. 2:12-14), fittingly describes Assyria. God declared that no one would rescue Israel and Judah. Other uses of lion imagery also indicate the impossibility of escape from divine judgment (Pss. 7:2; 50:22; cf. Is. 43:13; Mic. 5:7–8). These verses clearly depict the death (i.e., dissolution and exile) of the Northern Kingdom at the hands of the Assyrians (see Hos. 1:4; 2:3; 7:16; 8:14; 9:11–16; 10:15; 13:1, 7–9, 16) in fulfillment of the covenant curse of Deuteronomy 32:39. Judah's death would come a century later at the hands of the Babylonians. Although by this point they could not escape from lethal punishment, nonetheless hope remained in the eschatological future, when Israel and Judah, torn to pieces, would accept the consequences of their guilt and diligently seek Yahweh's face (Hos. 5:15b).

6:1–3 (D). Israel's Repentance and Healing/Resurrection. Hosea 6:1–3 is the fourth and center of the seven eschatological messages of hope and salvation in the book. Hosea 5:13–15 describe sickness and mauling leading to death, but these verses depict healing and resurrection in response to Israel's decision to return (shub "return," "repent") to Yahweh. Although some commentators hesitate to acknowledge a resurrection hope in this passage, the language of resurrection is unmistakable: the two Hebrew words qum ("revive," "arise") and khayah ("raise," "restore," "stand"; 6:2), when used together elsewhere in Scripture, clearly refer to resurrection (2 Kin. 13:21; Job 14:12–14; Is. 26:14, 19). The reference to three days may well allude to Jonah's experience. In Jonah's prayer during his three days and nights in the belly of the great fish, the prophet's language went beyond his own literal ordeal to describe a virtual death and resurrection (see Jon. 2:2, 6). Only a few years after Jonah's experience in the early eighth century, while Israel still vividly remembered his "death and resurrection," the late-eighth-century Prophet Hosea seems to have alluded to this event. Hosea reinforces this parallel to the experience of Jonah in the next chapter, where he compares Israel to a *yona*h (Jonah's name, which means "dove"; 7:11) who, like Jonah, fled from the presence of the Lord (7:13; cf. Jon. 1:3), went to Assyria (Hos. 7:11; cf. Jon. 3:1–3), and was swallowed up (Heb. bala'; Hos. 8:8; cf. Jon. 1:17). Hosea envisioned the Exile and subsequent return of Israel (and Judah) as recapitulating the "death and resurrection" experience of Jonah.

Also in the eighth century B.C., Isaiah clearly described the Messiah as the Representative Israel, whose life would recapitulate the experience of Israel, especially with regard to

His death and resurrection (see esp. the Servant Songs of Is. 42–53). There are numerous intertextual links between Hosea 5:11–6:3 and the messianic Servant Songs; for example, the words ratsats ("crush" or "trample"), kholi ("sickness," "grief," or "pain"), rapa' ("heal"), nasa' ("carry," "bear," or "go away"), 'asham ("guilt" or "sin"), khbash ("bind"), nakah ("strike"), and numerous additional linguistic parallels in the messianic Psalm 22.

Thus, Hosea identifies Israel as another Jonah, dying and then being resurrected on the third day, and Isaiah shows that the Messiah would be the Representative Israel, undergoing a death and resurrection like the first Israel. Jesus recognized these OT connections between God's servant Jonah (2 Kin. 14:25), the servant Israel, and the messianic Servant when He confidently proclaimed that as Jonah was in the belly of the fish for "three days and three nights," so the antitypical Jonah would be in the heart of the earth and rise after three days (Matt. 12:40). Likewise Paul can say that Christ rose on the third day "according to the Scriptures" (1 Cor. 15:4). Both Jesus and Paul accurately announced the fulfillment of the Jonah/Israel typology indicated by the prophets.

Yahweh would come to Israel like the dawn and like the rain (Hos. 6:3). The similarity in language between this description of Yahweh and the description of the messianic (Davidic) King in Psalm 72:6 gives this passage messianic connotations (cf. 2 Sam. 23:4). In the Holy Land, the rain falls throughout the grain-growing season from autumn (September and October) to early spring (sometimes translated as the "former rain"). It appears again at the end of the season (late March and April; sometimes translated as the "latter rain") and ripens the grain for harvest. In the eschatological context of Hosea 6:1–3 (cf. Joel 2:23, 28), this analogy prefigures the outpouring of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost (Acts 2) and the climactic outpouring of the Holy Spirit just before Christ's Second Coming to gather His people (Rev. 14:14–16; 18:1–4).

6:4–6 (C'). Judah and Israel Cut to Pieces by God's Prophets. Hosea 6:4–6 matches 5:12–14, repeating the same themes in reverse order. Historical Israel and Judah had no intention of repenting. In desperation God asked them both what He should do with them (6:4). He compared their khesed ("covenant loyalty," "love," "faithfulness") with morning clouds and dew that dissipate when the sun rises. Verse 5 repeats the image of God cutting Israel to pieces, but here the Lord specifies that He used the pronouncements of judgment through His prophets to cut (v. 5). The next verse presents His desire for khesed (“covenant loyalty,” “love,” “mercy,” “kindness”) and da’at (“true acknowledgment”; that is, knowing Him in a personal relationship), not meaningless, formalistic sacrifices (v. 6). Jesus cited this verse when challenging the Pharisees, linking this prophetic word with His own ministry of compassion (Matt. 9:13).

6:7–9 (B’). Social Injustice in Ephraim. Hosea 6:7–9 matches 5:10–11. God compared Israel’s covenant breaking to the time of Adam. Though the Heb. ’adam has been interpreted as a place name (“at Adam”) or as humankind in general (“like men”), it is best translated here as the personal name of the first human. Adam and Eve broke the covenant of Creation by their disobedience (6:7; cf. Gen. 1–3). Hosea 6:8–9, like the matching 5:10–11, describes various acts of social injustice, collectively called zimmah (“infamy,” “monstrous crimes,” “villainy,” “atrocities”).

6:10–11 (A’). The Horrible Thing in Israel. Hosea 6:10–11 matches 5:8–9 and decries to the cultic defilement (tame’) and spiritual harlotry (zenut) of Ephraim/Israel (see commentary on 4:11–14), called the “horrible thing” (Heb. sha’aririyah). The subsection ends by warning Judah of a harvest of judgment appointed for them in the more distant future (6:11a).

6:11b–7:16

Laments over Israel’s Failure to Return to Yahweh

Hosea 6:11b–7:16 is the central, climactic chiasmic section of the book of Hosea. In a series of accusations, Yahweh lamented over Israel’s sins and coming fate. He referred to them in the third person, as if addressing the court as a witness in the covenant lawsuit. This passage probably occurs during the unstable history of the Northern Kingdom in its final years of existence (see Hosea: Introduction).

- A Lament over Failed Divine Efforts (6:11b–7:2)
- B Lament over Samaria’s Domestic Policies and Practices (7:3–7)
- C Lament over Folly in Foreign Affairs (7:8–9)
- D Failure of Israel to Return and Seek God (7:10)

C’ Lament over Folly in Foreign Affairs (7:11–12)

B’ Lament over Domestic Policies and Practices (7:13–14)

A’ Lament over Failed Divine Efforts (7:15–16)

The Hebrew word shub (“return,” “restore,” “repent”) encapsulates the major theme of this section: Israel has sealed their fate by not returning to Yahweh. The section begins with 6:11b, best translated as a dependent clause connected to what follows in 7:1. Thus, it conveys the idea that God would cause the fortunes of His people to return (shub). The section ends in 7:16 with the divine lament of the fact that the people of Israel had not turned (shub) to the Most High (the “Most Sublime One”; cf. Deut. 3:12; 1 Sam. 2:10; Is. 59:18). Hosea 7:10, the center of this section and of the whole book, records the legal testimony of Yahweh against His people. Despite all His efforts to get their attention, they still refused to return and seek the Lord their God.

6:11b–7:2 (A). Lament over Failed Divine Efforts. Yahweh longed to restore Israel’s fortunes and heal them. But despite His efforts to train and strengthen them, they had followed the way of evil, apparently oblivious of the fact that God knew all about their evil deeds (7:2).

7:3–7 (B). Lament over Samaria’s Domestic Policies and Practices. Hosea 7:3–7 probably depicts the last years of Israel’s history as a nation, when one king after another took the throne by means of conspiracy, lies, and/or assassination (v. 3; cf. v. 7, which refers to the fall of their kings). The text plays on the Hebrew word for “adulterers” (na’ap) and the similar-sounding words for “bake” (’apah) and “anger” (’ap) (v. 4, 6; 8:5; 11:9). Yahweh compares the passion of the rulers for the fertility cult and for political treachery to an oven so hot that the baker does not need to stoke the fire throughout the baking process (7:4, 7). The rulers were also inflamed with wine (v. 5; cf. the parallel v. 14). Stretching out/joining hands (v. 5) refers to sealing an agreement with a handshake, as still occurs in modern times (see Is. 42:6).

7:8–9 (C). Lament over Folly in Foreign Affairs. Two baking metaphors calling Israel mixed up and half-baked describe their disastrous policy of flip-flopping between loyalties to Egypt and to Assyria. Bakers had to turn bread dough around in the bee-shaped oven so that all parts would get exposed to the hot coals. Like a round flat bread/cake that the baker failed to turn, Israel was half-baked, a fitting description of the poor quality of Israel's political situation.

7:10 (D). Failure of Israel to Return and Seek God. Hosea presents the Pride of Israel (i.e., Yahweh; see commentary on Hos. 5:1–7—although some translations consider the text to be referring to Israel's arrogance) giving legal testimony summarizing the divine indictment: Israel pursued other alliances but would not return to Yahweh. Yahweh did not identify any particular sin that Israel needed to stop. Rather, He repeatedly pled for the people to return/repent (Heb. shub) and to seek Him (Heb. baqash or darash); that is, seek a personal relationship (Heb. da'at) with Him (see 2:7; 3:5; 5:15; 6:1, 3, 6; 10:12; 11:5, 10–12; 12:6; 14:1–2). All the other reforms would naturally follow these two essentials. But Israel persistently refused, until finally God could do nothing more. They had broken the covenant relationship, and God lamented their imminent demise.

7:11–12 (C'). Lament over Folly in Foreign Affairs. Hosea 7:11–12 matches vv. 8–9. Like a silly dove (Heb. yonah; see commentary on 6:1–3), Ephraim first called to Egypt, then shifted to an alliance with Assyria, only to shift back to Egypt a few years later (7:11; see Hosea: Introduction). They were mixed up indeed.

7:13–14 (B'). Lament over Domestic Policies and Practices. Hosea 7:13–14 matches vv. 3–7. Yahweh cried out in woe (Heb. 'oy), a cry usually reserved for a funerary lament or situation of impending disaster (v. 13; cf. 1 Sam. 4:7–8; Is. 3:11; Jer. 4:13; Ezek. 24:6). Translators render the key verb in Hosea 7:14 variously as “assemble” or “slash/gash.” The latter would refer to the violent practice of members of the fertility cult, who cut themselves to get the attention of Baal so he would provide rain (cf. 1 Kin. 18:28).

7:15–16 (A'). Laments over Divine Failed Efforts. Hosea 7:15–16, the closing section of the chiasmic structure, repeats the same themes as the opening section in 6:11b–7:2.

8:1–9:7b

Indictment for Political and Cultic Unfaithfulness

This section (C') repeats and reinforces various themes encountered in the matching section (C) above.

A Announcement of Coming Judgment (8:1–3)

B Political and Cultic Sins (8:4–6)

C Alliances with Other Nations (8:7–13)

D Israel's Maker Forgotten (8:14)

C' Alliances with Other Nations (9:1–4)

B' Dissolution of the Cultic Festivals (9:5–6)

A' Announcement of Coming Judgment (9:7a–b)

8:1–3 (A). Announcement of Coming Judgment. Hosea 8:1–3, probably written during the reign of Hoshea, the last king of Israel (732–722 B.C.), begins with an alarm sounded on the shopar, warning of imminent judgment upon Israel (as section C began in 5:8). Yahweh compared the coming judgment to an eagle/vulture swooping down upon its prey (cf. Deut. 28:49–50), which reverses the picture of Yahweh as an eagle hovering over its nest at Israel's creation (Deut. 32:10–12). Hosea 8:1–3 gives a general summary of Israel's sins: though Israel claimed to know God, they had in fact broken Yahweh's covenant and rebelled against His Torah. A series of indictments and covenant curses follows.

8:4–6 (B). Political and Cultic Sins. Verse 4 refers to the rapid succession of kings at the end of Israel's history. Most took the throne through coups, intrigues, and assassinations (see Hosea: Introduction). Yahweh also condemns the counterfeit worship of the golden calf Jeroboam I set up in Bethel, called the “calf of Samaria” (a metonymy for the entire nation; cf. 10:5; 13:2). Only one calf remained because by this time in Israel's history, Assyria had already taken the northern part of the country, where the calf in Dan was located.

8:7–13 (C). Alliances with Other Nations. Verse 7 contains a proverbial wisdom statement expressing cause and effect. Israel had sown the wind (so to speak) of strife by casting about between alliances with superpowers. As a result, they would receive a much stronger blowback, reaping a storm/gale/whirlwind of devastating destruction (cf. Is. 29:6; Amos 1:14; Nah. 1:3). Another metaphor describes Israel as a stalk that never reached maturity and thus would produce no flour. But even if it were to produce, the grain would be swallowed up by foreigners.

The Lord continued to compare Israel to something undesirable (Hos. 8:8), to a wild donkey hiring lovers (v. 9; cf. Jer. 2:24–25), and to menial servants (Hos. 8:10). These metaphors all describe Israel's shifting alliances with other nations. Israel had also committed cultic sins related to the sacrifices (see 4:8) and spurned the many important teachings of God's Torah (8:11–13a). So God announced a reversal of the Exodus: Israel would return to Egypt (v. 13b).

8:14 (D). Israel's Maker Forgotten. Verse 14 summarizes the judgment against Israel for breaking the divine covenant. It closely parallels the covenant lawsuit of Deuteronomy 32:15–18. As the only explicit reference in Hosea to the Creation motif, it also parallels Isaiah 51:13. God made Israel a nation, but instead of remembering their Maker, both Israel and Judah had trusted in the constructions of their own hands (i.e., their vast building projects of temples, royal palaces, and city fortifications/strongholds). The historical fulfillment of their punishment, the covenant curse of destruction by fire (Deut. 32:22), occurred when Assyria destroyed Samaria in 722 B.C. and when the Babylonians later destroyed Jerusalem in 586 B.C.

9:1–4 (C'). Alliances with Other Nations. Hosea 9:1–4 matches 8:7–13. Hosea again rehearses Israel's spiritual harlotry. They loved the prostitute's wages but would not receive them. They would not continue to dwell in the Lord's land (see Lev. 25:23) but would "return to Egypt" (Hos. 9:3; further developed in 9:6; 11:5, 10–11).

9:5–6 (B'). Dissolution of the Cultic Festivals. Hosea 9:5–6 matches 8:4–6, returning to the theme of the false cult. The entire cultic calendar, including the counterfeit Festival of Tabernacles (cf. 1 Kin. 12:32), would end with the destruction and exile of the nation.

9:7a–b (A'). Announcement of Coming Judgment. Hosea 9:7a–b briefly summarizes the section and matches 8:1–3. Hosea proclaims the imminent arrival of the days of punishment/recompense. The nation knew what it had done, and Yahweh would hold it responsible.

9:7c–10:15

Indictment for Spiritual Prostitution/Idolatry

Hosea 9:7c–10:15 reinforces and further elaborates on the theme of Israel's spiritual harlotry discussed above. The whole section is structured around historical and geographical allusions that show that Israel's covenant unfaithfulness (spiritual harlotry) had a long history. It stretched all the way back to the time of the Exodus and the period of the judges and involved some of Israel's most revered and sacred geographical locations.

A Sins at Bethel ("House of God"; 9:7c–8)

B Sins at Gibeah (9:9)

C Sins at Baal Peor (9:10–14)

D Sins at Gilgal (9:15–10:4)

C' Sins at Beth Aven (10:5–8)

B' Sins at Gibeah (10:9–10)

A' Sins at Bethel (10:11–15)

9:7c–8 (A). Sins at Bethel. The reference to "house of his God" (Heb. bet-'elohayw) probably alludes to Bethel ("house of God"; v. 8). This matches the mention of Bethel in 10:15 (subsection a'). Hosea 9:7b–8 can be understood either as God's indictment against the foolish prophets and the ish haruakh (lit. "man of the spirit," "inspired man"), who had become insane, or alternatively as a false evaluation of true prophets by the wicked in Israel. Hosea 10:11–15 indicts the nation's vain trust in their mighty men. Both passages indicate that the punishment was to come because of their wickedness (9:7; 10:15). Bethel, once the place where the prophets flourished (2 Kin. 2:3), had become the main center for idolatrous worship of the golden calf, and the prophets had become fools and snares to the people (Hos. 9:7–8).

9:9 (B). Sins at Gibeah. Hosea's reference to Gibeah looks back to the time of the Judges, when the rape and murder of a Levite's concubine resulted in outrage and subsequent war (Judg. 19–21). Placed at the end of the book of Judges, this incident shows the shocking depths of depravity to which Israel had sunk. Now Hosea compares that generation to his contemporary generation, which had become just as deeply corrupted (Hos. 9:9).

9:10–14 (C). Sins at Baal Peor. Continuing the historical and geographical comparisons, Hosea refers back to the period of the Exodus from Egypt (9:10). He likens God's delightful experience with Israel, His "firstborn" son (Ex. 4:22), to the taste of early figs. But at the time of Israel's tragic apostasy at Baal Peor, just before entering Canaan (Num. 25:1–5), they devoted themselves to laboshet (lit. "the shame"), the Baal fertility cult rituals and deities. Thus, they became an object of abhorrence themselves (Hos. 9:10). In a parody on the fertility cult, Hosea warns that the people would receive the opposite of the fertility they desired: infertility, infanticide, miscarriage, and shriveled breasts (vv. 11–14).

9:15—10:4 (D). Sins at Gilgal. Gilgal was a major cultic center in Hosea's time (see 4:15; 12:11). Because of the evil deeds Israel had done there, Yahweh said that He hated them, which He immediately explained to mean that He would no longer love them (9:15). To "hate" in this context means to reject (see commentary on Mal. 1:2–5). This was no insensitive, arbitrary abandonment of His people. Letting them go caused God deep anguish (see Hos. 11:8–9). Using a wordplay on Ephraim's name (from Heb. para', "fruitful"), Hosea announced that they had dried up and would no longer bear fruit (peri; cf. 13:15; 14:8). God said He would cast away/reject/drive out (garash) Ephraim from His house (9:15), technical language that finalized the divorce between Yahweh and Israel (see Lev. 21:7; Num. 30:9).

Gilgal may have been singled out because of its historical association with King Saul's failed kingship and rejection by God (1 Sam. 11:14–15). Now God would reject His people and their princes (Heb. sar), who were stubborn/rebellious (Heb. sarar) just as Saul was. As God had rent the kingdom from Saul, so would He remove the kingdom of Israel, sending the people into captivity as "wanderers among the nations" (Hos. 9:17). He would break down the cult centers with their altars and sacred pillars and remove their king (in fulfillment of the covenant curse of Deut. 28:36) because they did not revere the Lord. The people, whose hearts were divided (Heb. khalaq, "slippery," "deceitful"), would realize too late that their human king, far from being a blessing, was like a poisonous herb growing up in the midst of a food-producing field (Hos. 10:1–4).

10:5–8 (C'). Sins at Beth Aven. Hosea 10:5–8 matches 9:10–14. Hosea depicts the dismantling of the cult at Beth Aven ("house of iniquity," a slur for Bethel; "house of God"; see 4:15; 5:8), its glory or splendor taken away. This alludes to the naming of the child Ichabod ("the glory has departed") when the Philistines captured the ark in the time of Eli (1 Sam. 4:21). The golden calf would be given over to the great king of Assyria (see Hos. 5:12–15), the cultic high places of Ephraim destroyed, and their king cut off/destroyed. In unbearable shame the people would cry for the mountains and hills to fall on them (cf. Luke 23:30; Rev. 6:16). In short, Assyria would wholly destroy and dissolve Israel (fulfilled in 722 B.C. and afterward).

10:9–10 (B'). Sins at Gibeah. Hosea 10:9–10 matches 9:9. The Lord charged Israel with sins that had continued since "the days of Gibeah."

10:11–15 (A'). Sins at Bethel. Hosea 10:11–15 matches 9:7c–8. In 10:11 the Lord compares Israel to a heifer that once loved to thresh grain and did not even need a goad or tight rein. But now He had to harness it along with Judah. Employing another agricultural metaphor, He encouraged His people to sow righteousness, reap love, and till the ground by seeking Him so He would come down and rain (Heb. yarah, which can also mean "teacher of") righteousness (v. 12). He mentioned the foundational work of tilling last. But instead they had plowed/planted wickedness and reaped injustice (v. 13). As punishment their fortresses would be decimated, as some already had been when Shalmaneser III campaigned in Israel in the time of Jehu (841 B.C.), forcing the king to capitulate (v. 14). The location of Beth Arbel is not known.

11:1–14:9

GOD'S WAYWARD SON

This third major part of the book also forms the seventh section of the book's chiasmic macro-structure.

- A Israel's Ultimate Return (11:1–11)
- B The Deceitful Son (11:12–12:8)
- C Israel Led Up from Egypt (12:9–14)
- D Summary of Yahweh's Case against Israel (13:1–3)
- C' Israel Led Up from Egypt (13:4–9)
- B' The Foolish Son (13:10–16)
- A' Yahweh's Invitation and Promise of Restoration (14:1–9)

Whereas Hosea 1–3 depicted Israel as Yahweh's wayward wife, chapters 11–14 shift the metaphor to describe the nation as Yahweh's wayward (prodigal) son.

11:1–11 (A). Israel's Ultimate Return. Hosea 11:1–4 contains the most tender depiction in all of Scripture of Yahweh's love for Israel, His own son (v. 4 extends the metaphor to God's loving care for animals). In its immediate context, the statement “out of Egypt I called My son” refers to historical Israel’s Exodus from Egypt. But both in Hosea and in other eighth-century prophets, it also refers to the future eschatological exodus connected with Israel’s return from exile and the coming of the Messiah (see 2:14–15; 12:9, 13; 13:4–5; Is. 11:15–16; 35; 40:3–5; 41:17–20; 51:9–11; 52:3–6, 11–12; 55:12–13; Amos 9:7–15; Mic. 7:8–20). The Latter Prophets recognized Israel’s Exodus from Egypt as a type of the messianic new exodus. Matthew remains faithful to this larger context, citing Hosea 11:1 as a catchphrase for all OT passages that predict the eschatological new exodus and point to the Messiah as the Representative Israel. The life of the Messiah would recapitulate the experience of ancient Israel, but He would succeed where the historical Israel had failed (Matt. 1–5).

Instead of responding to Yahweh’s tender love with respect and obedience, His prodigal son rebelled and left the Father (Hos. 11:2; cf. Luke 15:11–32). Israel spent his fortune, so to speak, on riotous living amid the licentious Baal cult. Bent on backsliding/turning away from God (Hos. 11:7), they refused to return and repent (v. 5). In the Torah the punishment for such a rebellious son was death (Deut. 21:18–21), which happened when the nation was destroyed and the people were exiled (Hos. 11:5–6).

Hosea 11:8–11 constitutes the fifth of the seven hope and salvation oracles in the book. As in the covenant lawsuit against His wayward wife (2:14–15), the verdict upon God’s wayward son ends with a surprise. God could not bear to give Israel up or hand His people over to everlasting destruction, as He had the cities of the plain (Admah and Zeboim; Gen. 19:24–25). Yahweh had overturned (Heb. hapak) those cities in His anger, but now His own heart was overturned/churned/disturbed (Heb. hapak; cf. Lam. 1:20) with passionate love, and His compassion/sympathy (Heb. nikhumim) was aroused/stirred (lit. “grew warm”; Hos. 11:8). Although having every right to eliminate Israel forever, the Holy One is not vindictive, arbitrary, and heartless. The Lion (Heb. ’aryeh) of Israel would roar, calling His wayward children (cubs) home. Never again would they be destroyed. They would come back home trembling (kharad), a fitting attitude of humility before the great Lion (vv. 9–10). But they would also return from Egypt (= Assyria) swiftly and eagerly fluttering (the second meaning of the Heb. kharad) like a bird (v. 11). The prodigal son would return home, welcomed by the rejoicing Father.

11:12–12:8 (B). The Deceitful Son. Judah still roamed (rad, “walks,” “roams,” “rules,” or “is unruly”) with God, the faithful Holy One (11:12b), but Israel was self-deceived like a person attempting to herd the wind (12:1). Hosea might have written these verses during the mid-720s B.C., when a measure of prosperity briefly returned to Israel under its last king. Self-deceived Israel dealt deceitfully with Yahweh (11:12; 12:1), cheating on His covenant, making foreign treaties with Assyria (12:1), and using deceitful scales in commerce (v. 7; cf. Prov. 11:1). Self-deception overtook the nation: they felt secure in their riches and confident that no one could accuse them of a sinful offense (Hos. 12:8; cf. Rev. 3:17).

Yahweh included Judah in His covenant lawsuit (Heb. rib) against “Jacob” when He announced the verdict. According to the principle of lex talionis (retributive justice), the punishment would correspond to their deceitful ways (Hos. 12:2). Hosea reinforces the theme of deceit by reminding Israel of the experience of their forefather Jacob, whose life story and very name (ya’aqob, “supplanter”) were linked to trickery. This is the only mention of the patriarchal period in the book. Hosea focuses on Jacob’s positive experience of repentance at the Jabbok River, where with anguish and tears he struggled and prevailed against the Angel (Gen. 32:24–28), and on Jacob’s night vision at Bethel (Gen. 28:12–19). Some translations bring home the message to Hosea’s contemporary audience (and to us) by characterizing Jacob’s experience as God speaking to us (Hos. 12:4). Other translations, including the LXX, read “spoke to him.” Although the experience happened to Jacob, later generations could relate to it as if it had actually happened to them. Hosea continues his aside by appealing to the faithful remnant of Israel (and to us today) to repent/return (Heb. shub) with God’s help, to keep the basic covenant stipulations of mercy/love (khesed, “covenant loyalty”) and justice (mishpat), and to wait/hope (qawah) continually on their God (v. 6; cf. Mic. 6:8).

12:9–14 (C). Israel Led Up from Egypt. Yahweh reminded Israel that He was the God of the Exodus. In an ironic reversal of Israel’s current prosperity, Yahweh would punish their rebellion by stripping them of their opulent luxury. Instead of dwelling in tents for just a few days during the Festival of Tabernacles (Lev. 23:42–43), they would again dwell in tents permanently (Hos. 12:9–10). In Gilead (gil’ad, “heap of witness”), where Jacob memorialized his covenant with Laban by erecting a heap (Heb. gal) of stones and making sacrifices (Gen. 31:52), Israel had erected pagan altars. The destruction of these altars would turn them into heaps (Heb. gal) of stones (Hos. 12:11). In vv. 12–14, Hosea compares Jacob's experience tending/keeping/guarding (Heb. shamar) sheep in Syria (Gen. 28–29) to that of the Prophet Moses, who kept/cared for/preserved (Heb. shamar) Israel at the time of the Exodus. Alluding to the covenant curses predicted by Moses (Deut. 4:25–26; 32:16), Yahweh would leave Israel in their bloodguilt and repay (Heb. shub, lit. "return") them for their reproach/contempt of Him and His law (Hos. 12:14).

13:1–3 (D). Summary of Yahweh's Case against Israel. In three pathos-filled verses Hosea summarizes Israel's apostasy and the fundamental indictments of Yahweh's covenant lawsuit against them. Verse 1 has been understood as either saying that before committing apostasy Ephraim spoke with trembling (Heb. retet)—that is, humbly and with "piety" (NJPS; cf. Is. 66:2)—and was exalted in Israel, or that he spoke with such imposing authority that people trembled (retet)—either way a positive evaluation. But they incurred guilt in the Baal fertility cult and (spiritually) died (Hos. 13:1). Verse 2 summarizes how Israel kept sinning "more and more" by worshiping idols. Verse 3, the final verse of this section, depicts Israel's disappearance from history, utilizing four similes from the natural world—morning mist/clouds, early dew, chaff before the wind, and smoke.

13:4–9 (C'). Israel Led Up from Egypt. Verse 13:4a repeats the opening verse of the matching subsection (12:9–14) almost verbatim. Focusing on Israel's Exodus, 13:4–5 provides a synopsis of the Decalogue in Exodus 20:1–3, including the covenant preamble (lit. "I am Yahweh"); a historical prologue identifying Yahweh as the Savior who freed them from Egypt and led them in the wilderness; and a restatement of the central stipulation, the first commandment against worshiping other gods. Yahweh then indicted Israel for following the path predicted by Moses (Deut. 8:11–15; 31:2). When they were filled/satisfied, they became proud and forgot Yahweh, going after other gods (Hos. 13:6). At the conclusion of this subsection, Yahweh sentenced Israel to destruction for their polytheism using the imagery of brutal and fatal wild animal attacks (vv. 7–9). The reference to Yahweh keeping watch/lurking ('ashur) like a leopard may be a wordplay on the homonym Assyria

('ashur), implying that God would use Assyria as the agent of Israel's destruction.

13:10–16 (B'). The Foolish Son. Ephraim was not only a deceitful son (as in 11:12–12:8) but an unwise one who lacked the sense to even present himself at the opening of the womb at the time of birth (13:13). This birthing metaphor captures a time of crisis in Israel's government, probably after Shalmaneser V took King Hoshea captive along with the royal family and high-ranking government officials (722 B.C.; see vv. 9–10). A baby in a breach position in the womb also puts the life of the mother in serious doubt. The situation seems hopeless.

Amid this context of apparent hopelessness and imminent death, the Lord presents the sixth of the seven eschatological hope and salvation oracles in the book (v. 14). There will be a resurrection from the dead. God promised to ransom/deliver His people from the grave and redeem them from death. The following two sentences are either declarative statements (MT, "I will be...") or rhetorical questions (LXX, "Where are...?"; the two phrases look similar in Hebrew) announcing victory over death and the grave (cf. 1 Cor. 15:54, 55). Yahweh assures that vengeance/revenge (sometimes translated as "pity, compassion, repentance") would end (lit. "hidden from My eyes"). In the meantime, however, Israel's fruitful prosperity would pass away before the proverbial withering east wind (Hos. 13:15), as Samaria would face a three-year siege (2 Kin. 17:5). In fulfillment of the covenant curses, the cruel and violent onslaught of the Assyrian army would slit pregnant women open (Hos. 13:16; see 2 Kin. 15:16; Amos 1:13; "God's Judgment in the Prophets," p. 981).

14:1–8 (A'). Yahweh's Invitation and Promise of Restoration. Hosea 14:1–9, the final section of the book, matches 11:1–11. It addresses a people soon to be orphaned in exile. In 14:1–3, Hosea urged Israel to return to Yahweh, even suggesting what to say to Him: words of repentance, requests for forgiveness, and vows of right actions (sacrifices/fruit "of our lips") and loyalty to/trust in only Him. He encouraged them to come boldly, with the promise that in God the fatherless/orphan finds mercy/compassion (v. 3).

The last of the seven passages of eschatological hope and salvation, vv. 4–8 present the glorious promise that God would one day heal their backsliding (Heb. meshubah, "turning back," "apostasy," "waywardness") and "love them freely" (Heb. nedabah, "unconditionally"). His anger would turn away (v. 4). In vv. 5–6 Yahweh depicts Himself as dew watering Israel. As a result Israel would grow rapidly and prolifically like a lily/crocus, with roots (stability), spreading branches/shoots (splendor), a fragrance (desirability) like the mighty cedar forests of Lebanon, and beauty like the olive tree—all in fulfillment of the promised covenant blessings (Deut. 30:9–10; 33:13–16). Shifting the metaphor, Hosea 14:7 presents God Himself as the spreading tree (for the only time in Scripture) and those who would return (from exile and to Yahweh) as sitting/dwelling under His shadow (cf. Song 2:3). They would experience abundant life comparable to new grain, a luxuriant vine, and the sweet scent of wine from Lebanon (Hos. 14:7; cf. Song 4:11–15). Again, God likens Himself to an evergreen tree with edible fruit (perhaps the stone pine, Pinus pinea). He, not the idolatrous fertility cult, is Israel's sole source of fruitfulness (Hos. 14:8).

14:9. Wisdom Epilogue: The Ways of Yahweh Are Right! The final lesson of Hosea is a wisdom

saying inviting wise readers to understand and know (Heb. yada') the contents of his message; that is, to apply it to their own lives in practical ways. The invitation opens with a question: "Who is wise?" (or "Whoever is wise..."; Heb. mi khakam). This parallels other such wisdom invitations (see Ps. 107:43; Jer. 9:12), as does the contrast between the righteous and wicked/rebellious (Ps. 1:6; Prov. 10:24, 29–30; 11:3; 12:3, 5, 7). However, in keeping with Israel's rebellion against Yahweh detailed in his book, Hosea uses the more specific word "rebels" for the wicked. Finally, Hosea focuses on vindicating the character of Yahweh, whose ways are right (Heb. yashar, "upright," "straight," "just"). He leaves the reader with a choice: walk according to the upright ways of Yahweh (i.e., the covenant stipulations) and reap the glorious blessings promised for the future of Israel or rebel and stumble in iniquity (i.e., reap the covenant curses; cf. Hos. 4:5; 5:5; 14:2; Lev. 26:37) as Israel did. In other words, the reader must either embrace the hope offered by the Lord or stagger in the hopelessness that leads to destruction.

JOEL

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The book is named after its author, the Prophet Joel, whose name means “the Lord is God.” Several others bear this name in the OT, so it was not uncommon. Much of Joel’s life remains unknown, yet the literary quality of his poetry and his familiarity with the temple rituals suggests that he was well educated. He may have lived in Jerusalem, since most of his message refers to Jerusalem and Judah.

Date. The book of Joel provides no direct information to determine its date of composition. Based largely on internal evidence, scholars have suggested dates ranging from the early monarchy to the postexilic period. Although evidence exists for a later date, this commentary opts for an early date, around the ninth century B.C. This date appears to be more consistent with the historical context reflected in the book, although there is evidence that it could be a little later.

Backgrounds. Joel delivered his message against the backdrop of a plague of locusts that decimated the entire agricultural production of the nation. Since the book provides no information about the time when this plague occurred or about the historical circumstances of Joel’s ministry, it is difficult to determine the background of the book. Some scholars have attempted to reconstruct its background based on circumstantial information within the book itself. It makes no reference to the king, prominently mentions priests and elders, portrays active temple service, discusses captive Israelites and Jewish slaves sold to the Greeks, and alludes to Egypt, Edom, Tyre, Sidon, and Philistia as enemies. Therefore, some have argued that the prophetic activity of Joel occurred during the childhood of King Joash, when priests and elders held power over Judah (2 Kin. 11:18–21). Therefore, Joel’s invective against foreign nations may allude to the invasion of Judah by a coalition of nations in the time of Jehoram (852–841 B.C.; 2 Chr. 21:16–17). These circumstantial details, however, may have more than one interpretation, and most scholars have tended to understand the same data as indicating a later time, most likely the postexilic period after the reconstruction of the temple.

Joel is a unified composition produced during a crisis caused by a locust invasion. Although the ambiguity of the data precludes absolute certainty, the lack of any reference to the Assyrians and Babylonians may indicate that Joel ministered prior to the appearance of these nations as enemies of Israel and Judah. Joel’s prophetic message begins by describing a locust invasion in his own time and follows with predictions of future judgments and blessings. This appears to place Joel’s prophetic activity sometime during the early monarchy.

Theology and Purpose. The book of Joel belongs to the genre of classical prophecy and contains a prophetic message framed within God’s covenant with Israel that reaches universal dimensions in the context of the Day of the Lord.

1. Day of the Lord. Joel organizes his message around the concept of the Day of the Lord, when God would intervene in history to judge and/or deliver His people and punish those who oppose His kingdom (Is. 13:6–16; Amos 5:18–20; Obad. 15–16; Zeph. 1:7–18; Mal. 4:5). Joel depicts the coming of the Day of the Lord in three stages. First, an unprecedented plague of locusts fell upon the land as an immediate judgment, which called for a response of submission and repentance (Joel 1:1–20). Joel implies that the Lord brought the current crisis because the people had neglected their covenantal responsibilities. Second, a worse judgment would follow the locust plague: an enemy invasion led by the Lord (2:1–27). Finally, the Lord would mercifully reverse the punishment and fully restore the land and the people. In connection with the eschatological Day of the Lord, God would pour out His Spirit, accompanied by signs in the heavens, and would bring His people to their land. Subsequently, the Lord would summon the nations to gather together in the Valley of Jehoshaphat to receive God's verdict, culminating in the final establishment of God's rule from Zion (2:28–3:21).

2. God and Evil. The book depicts a conflict between God and evil in Israel and among the nations. In keeping with His holy character, God would bring judgment on both His people and the enemy nations. Indeed, the judgment would begin with His people, indicating the responsibilities entailed in the covenant relationship. Once His people respond with repentance and humility, God would mitigate judgment with mercy. In other words, God's rightful reaction against sin and sinners always blends with mercy and forgiveness. Through the outpouring of the Spirit, God would generously bestow immeasurable blessings upon His people to transform them into instruments of the Spirit. The theme of cosmic conflict emerges in a very particular way as God unceasingly battles the evil forces embodied in the enemy nations. On the eschatological Day of the Lord, He would reverse the chaotic circumstances of a world marked by sin and rebellion. As God's chosen city, Zion (Jerusalem) would play an important role in this conflict (Zion is mentioned seven times; 2:1, 15, 23, 32; 3:16–17, 21). The mention of Zion, the seat of God's presence and universal kingship, evokes God's covenant with His people. It appears as the place of refuge and joy for the remnant. The prophet announces the final restoration of God's people and the establishment of God's kingdom. The promises of salvation would infuse hope in the hearts of the people.

COMMENTARY

1:1–20

The Immediate Day of the Lord

Joel 1:1–12 describes a locust invasion, drought, and fire that combined to devastate the nation. In the face of such unspeakable disaster, the prophet calls the leaders and the people to lament, fast, and pray as they appeal to the Lord to reverse the crisis (vv. 13–20).

1:1–12. Description of the Judgment. The prophet commences by describing an unprecedented plague of locusts that destroyed the economy. The content of the message originated with God. He revealed it to His servant, the prophet, who proclaimed the word of the Lord (v. 1).

As described here, locust probably refers to a common edible insect (Lev. 11:22). Locust plagues are always a concern throughout the Middle East. They sometimes come from the semiarid parts of eastern Africa and southwestern Asia. They form huge swarms that migrate to distant lands, where they rapidly devour large amounts of vegetation. After the devastation, the locusts either depart or stay and reproduce themselves to continue their destructive task. The prophets often declared destructive natural phenomena, such as locusts (cf. Deut. 28:38, 42) and drought (Deut. 11:17), to be manifestations of God's judgment against His people's unfaithfulness to the covenant (cf. Deut. 28:15, 38, 42; 11:17) or against the nations (cf. Ex. 10:1–20). When He punished His people, God intended to call them back to the covenant faithfulness (Deut. 30:1–3; 1 Kin. 8:35; 2 Chr. 6:26) that would enable them to find refuge in Him. In other words, these were disciplinary actions of a loving Father who controls all natural phenomena.

Although locust invasions happened occasionally, the plague mentioned by Joel caused exceptional destruction of crops, grains, and orchards. It must have caused terrible devastation, leaving in its wake starvation, poverty, and disease. The animals had no food, and the priests had no resources to perform the ritual oblations and sacrifices in the temple.

In addition to the locusts, a severe drought caused a fire and devastated the land, likely destroying whatever had escaped the voracity of the locusts (Joel 1:19). The prophet addressed different groups within the community, the elders, the inhabitants of the land, the drunkards, the priests, and the farmers, calling attention to the impact of the disaster on each one of them. The breakdown of the economic and spiritual situation had affected all segments of society and called for an urgent response. What God had done to Egypt, He was now doing to Israel (cf. Ex. 10:4, 5). The prophet lists no sins to merit so harsh a punishment, but the reference to the drunkards may indicate that the people enjoyed sinful pleasures. Other prophets explicitly condemn drunkenness (Hos. 7:5; Amos 4:1). Joel 2:27 may also indicate a problem with idolatry, a sin which would constitute a most serious violation of the covenant bond. As a result of covenant transgression, all the trees of the field dried up and the joy of all the people (lit. “sons of Adam”) withered (1:12). In the Garden of Eden, God gave the first couple the fruit of all the trees of the garden for food, but now human survival was threatened because of the unfruitfulness of the trees.

1:13–20. Response to the Judgment. In view of that devastating plague, the priests should have taken the lead and convoked the elders and the people to lament, fast, and pray. Human strategies and resources could not resolve this crisis. A crisis that has spiritual causes ought to be confronted with spiritual resources. Lamentation provides sufferers with a strategy to master a crisis. Lamenters pour out their souls before the Lord and acknowledge that only He can provide relief amidst their suffering and grief. Some psalms demonstrate how the Israelites lamented. They usually contain not only expressions of grief but also statements of confidence in God and vows to praise Him (Pss. 3; 4; 13; 22; 31; 39; 57; 69; 71; 77; 139).

In modern times, fasting (abstaining from food) has become a means of protest and a way to pressure higher authorities. In biblical times, however, fasting expressed grief over sin and a recognition of our ultimate dependence on God. The law mandated fasting only on the Day of Atonement; however, in times of crisis the leaders could call for fasting as an expression of repentance and humility to seek God’s mercy (1 Sam. 7:6; 2 Chr. 20:3; Neh. 9:1–3; Jon. 3:5–8).

Crying for help seems to be one of the primary functions of prayer in the Bible. Joel summoned the people to cry out to the Lord, the proper response to the ominous crisis engulfing the land. In crying to the Lord, the suffering people expressed not only pain but the recognition that only the Lord could reverse their unbearable circumstances. By urging lamenting, fasting, and praying, the prophet acknowledged the swarm of locusts and its consequences as the Lord’s work. While humans engaged in rational communication with God, the cattle, flocks of sheep, and beasts of the field groaned (their way of praying?) to the Creator for the satisfaction of their hunger (Joel 1:18). Because of human sin, both human and animal life suffered, and both depended on God for restoration.

The first section of the book describes a contemporary crisis, triggered by the locust invasion, and a prescribed response to it. However, as terrifying as that disaster may have been, an even worse judgment loomed on the horizon: the impending Day of the Lord.

2:1–27

The Impending Day of the Lord

Using the imagery of a locust plague, the prophet predicted that the Lord would raise up a foreign army to punish Judah (2:1–11). In response to the impending intensified disaster, the people should repent and turn to the Lord (vv. 12–17).

2:1–11. Description of the Judgment. Guards manned the towers on the walls of ancient cities and would sound the trumpet (shopar) as soon as they spotted an enemy army or a suspicious movement on the horizon. Having privileged information, the prophet demanded they sound the trumpet/horn to warn of the impending disaster. The crisis would come with thick darkness, clouds, and fire (vv. 2–3). Notably, these elements also appeared on Mount Sinai when God came down to make a covenant with His people (Deut. 5:22). Now the Lord would come to enforce the covenant curses. As He brought the darkness of the ninth plague on the land of Egypt (Ex. 10:21–23), the Lord would also bring darkness on His unfaithful people. Next, the prophet describes a powerful army marching toward Zion. Some scholars have argued that this section, like chapter 1, describes a locust invasion. However, the language and imagery of the locusts appears to metaphorically announce an imminent enemy attack. By evoking the ceaseless advance of a locust horde, the prophet describes the enemy’s military prowess. They would come like an avalanche that no barricade could hold.

As that powerful army marched forward, humans would panic with terror and the cosmic order would come to the brink of collapse. This poetic description stresses the severity of God’s impending judgment, which would dwarf the previous crisis triggered by the locusts. After a brief description of an invading army, this section climaxes with an astonishing observation: the enemy army belongs to the Lord, who marches forward to execute judgment upon His own people (Joel 2:11). At times, the Israelites understood the Day of the Lord as a day of deliverance and blessings for Zion. They felt secure in the promises of God and firmly believed that even though other cities like Samaria might be defeated, Zion would stand forever because it belonged to the Lord in a unique way. Indeed, no enemy could overtake Zion. But the Lord Himself could. Because they neglected their covenantal responsibilities, the people had become the Lord’s enemies. He would march ahead of that destructive army to inflict due punishment upon the covenant breakers.

2:12–17. Response to the Judgment. The prophet now explicitly demands a change of heart. The external signs of contrition he called for in response to the locust invasion should reflect internal thoughts and intentions. Israelites customarily tore their clothing to express grief or repentance, but Joel tells the people to rend their hearts, not their garments (2:13). Repentance ought to accompany fasting, prayer, and weeping as the proper response to the impending Day of the Lord. God invited His people to turn to Him (v. 12), a call the prophet immediately reiterated (v. 13). God intended for the people to repent (Heb. shub, “turn,” “repent”), turn toward Him, and completely change the direction of their lives. The prophet again lists no specific sins from which they were to turn, although, as already noted, drunkenness (1:5) and idolatry (2:27) are plausible inferences. Presumably, once they humbled themselves and turned to the Lord, they would know which sins to confess in order to mend their broken relationship with God.

As the basis for repentance, the prophet alludes to the covenantal relationship between God and His people that is implicit in the expression “your God” (v. 13). Furthermore, by listing God’s gracious attributes, Joel points to God’s immutable character and loyalty to the covenant in order to reinforce the hope that God would reverse the judgment. After all, God is not a vengeful judge but a gracious and merciful Lord (Ex. 34:6–7; Num. 14:18; Neh. 9:17; Pss. 86:15; 103:8; 145:8; Jon. 4:2; and Nah. 1:3). Repentance, however, does not function as a magic manipulation of God; the Lord remains sovereign to either accept or reject the penitent response of His people. All they can do is repent and leave the rest with God. As the prophet clarifies, who knows if the Lord might relent? (Joel 2:14). The phrase “who knows” expresses hope amidst uncertainty, calling people to willingly submit.

Again the prophet called for the trumpet to be blown. But instead of announcing the coming of an invading army, this time the trumpet call was to convoke a sacred assembly to plead with the Lord for mercy. Joel addressed the priests using language reminiscent of the Sinai covenant. He commanded them to sanctify the congregation in order to prepare them to appear before the Lord (see Ex. 19:10). Usually, only the elders or heads of families attended such an assembly. However, the seriousness of the impending crisis required the entire nation to attend the convocation, including children and nursing babes, who apparently had no formal worship obligations (1 Sam. 1:21–24). Even those recently married, who were usually excused from such convocations (Deut. 24:5), had to interrupt their honeymoons. Such a time of crisis required them to deny themselves a most legitimate human pleasure and come to the temple to join the sacred assembly. Such an extensive demonstration of contrition recalls the response of the Ninevites to the preaching of Jonah (Jon. 3:5–9).

Joel called the priests, as representatives of the community before God, to stand in the inner court (1 Kin. 6:36), the area between the porch (i.e., the door of the temple) and the altar of burnt offerings, where priests performed some of their cultic services. The priests wept and interceded for the nation on the same spot where Solomon had prayed to the Lord during the inauguration of the temple years before (1 Kin. 8:22). Scholars have called prayers like the one Joel composed “communal laments” (see Pss. 44; 79–80; 89; Lam. 3:40–42; 5:1–22). This prayer reveals three essential aspects of biblical prayer. First, it petitioned God to spare the people and, in doing so, acknowledged the people’s sinfulness and exclusive reliance on God’s mercy. Second, it appealed to the covenant. God Himself had a vested interest in the restoration of Judah because they were His people and His inheritance/heritage (Joel 2:17). The exhortation for the people to honor their covenant obligations (v. 13) matches the petition for God to remember His covenant with His people. Third, the prayer focused on protecting God’s reputation among the nations, not on the material prosperity of the people.

2:18–27. Reversal of the Judgment. Joel 2:18 marks a turning point in the crisis Joel had announced. Because of His inexhaustible love, God would accept the people’s repentance and answer their prayer. In turning His merciful attention to His land and His people, the Lord restored the covenant bond and set out to reverse the effects of the locust plague. He reiterated the covenant promises and pledged to give grain, wine, and oil back to His people (Deut. 11:13–15). To a people suffering the ravages of famine and other hardships, such promises must have sounded like hope for the renewal of life itself. The Lord would even go beyond their material needs by removing their reproach and restoring their dignity. Moreover, He would drive away the very enemy threatening their security (lit. “the northern one”; some translations supply “army” or “horde” because of the context; Joel 2:20). Weakened by lack of food, that enemy would drown in the eastern sea (the Dead Sea) and the western sea (the Mediterranean), provoking a rising stench. The identity of “the northern one” is debated. It may refer to either a locust swarm or an invading foreign army. Although the locusts are a plausible reference, this term most likely refers to a foreign army attacking God’s people. Most invasions of Israel and Judah came from the Syrians, Assyrians, and Babylonians who penetrated the land from the north (Is. 14:31; 41:25; Jer. 1:4, 13–15; 4:6; Zeph. 2:13; cf. Ezek. 38:6, 15; 39:2).

In light of such bountiful blessings, the prophet invited those who had previously groaned and lamented to celebrate the restoration. In a complete reversal of fortunes, the prophet exhorted the personified land to rejoice because of the marvelous acts of the Lord, assured the beasts of the field that the fields and trees had received new life, and finally urged the people to rejoice in the Lord because He would send rain to reverse the drought (Joel 1:7), bringing back bountiful harvests (2:21–24). The call for celebration progresses from the inanimate land to the animals and finally to God’s people. This reverses the arrangement of the first chapter, which begins by summoning the people to mourn (1:2–15) and concludes with a portrayal of the miserable state of the animals and the land (1:16–20). The former/autumn rain normally began in September and October and produced the right conditions for plowing and sowing. The latter/spring rain fell in March and April, enabling the crops to ripen fully.

The Hebrew word hammoreh, usually translated as “the former rain” or “the autumn rain,” can also mean “the teacher.” Joel 2:23 would then become a promise to send “the teacher of righteousness.” The context may favor the translation “the former rain” in connection with the word litsdaqah (“righteously,” “faithfully”). Moreover, the Bible associates rain with right teaching (1 Kin. 8:35–36; Is. 30:20–23) and compares the lack of the word of God to a drought (Amos 8:11–12). On the other hand, the translation “the teacher of righteousness” could refer to the eschatological prophet announced by Moses (Deut. 18:15–18; 34:10). This messianic figure, in contrast with the previously mentioned “northerner,” would expose error and teach the truth to the people.

In an absolute reversal, the Lord promised to restore the years of devastation by reaching back into the past and recovering all that the plague had destroyed. This magnificent act of redemption would culminate in a restoration and reaffirmation of four fundamental truths: God would reaffirm His presence in the midst of His people, reiterate His covenantal relationship with them, claim their exclusive loyalty, and deliver them from shame (Joel 2:27). The destructive Day of the Lord would become the redemptive Day of the Lord. The devastated land would turn into a fertile ground teeming with lush vegetation and fruitful harvests, the starving cattle would enjoy abundant pastures, and God’s suffering people would delight in the blessings of the covenant.

2:28–3:21

The Eschatological Day of the Lord

The final major section of Joel takes a clear eschatological turn. Although God’s covenant with Israel remains the frame of reference, the scope of the prophetic message transcends national and ethnic boundaries to depict a universal Day of the Lord, a day of blessing and salvation. In connection with that day, God would give the Spirit to all flesh (2:28–32), judge the enemies of His people (3:1–15), and eventually establish His eternal kingdom (3:16–21).

2:28–32. Description of Promises. The opening sentence of v. 28 clearly marks the beginning of a new section. This promise harks back to Moses, who wished all of God’s people would become prophets (Num. 11:29). Throughout OT times, God gave the Spirit intermittently to enable select individuals (e.g., judges, prophets, and kings) to perform specific assignments. Through Joel, God promised the Spirit to all flesh, regardless of age, gender, or social boundaries. The universal outpouring of the Spirit points back to the promise of rain in Joel 2:23. As the rain would revitalize the vegetation, so the Spirit would rejuvenate the people. The outpouring of the Spirit prophesied here specifically entails the manifestation of the prophetic gift. By turning all people into prophets, the Spirit would propel a powerful proclamation of God’s message.

Joel announced wonders in heaven and on earth that would come in connection with the outpouring of the Spirit and would precede the Day of the Lord. These signs would include blood, fire, pillars of smoke, and the upheaval of the sun and the moon (vv. 30–31), some of which also accompanied the events surrounding the Exodus (Ex. 7:17–25; 9:23–29; 13:21–22; 19:16–18) and other divine apparitions (Ps. 18:7–15; Hab. 3:8–16). This short section closes with the Lord's promise to deliver whoever "calls on" His name; that is, whoever worships Him and publicly proclaims His deeds (Ps. 105:1; Is. 12:4). He promised to in turn call them among the survivors/remnant who would dwell safely in the eschatological Zion (Joel 2:32; see below, "Outpouring of the Spirit").

3:1–15. Description of the Judgment. The opening of Joel 3:1–15, "in those days and at that time," conveys the eschatological tone of this section and points to events far beyond the lifetime of the prophet. In connection with the restoration of His people and the establishment of His kingdom, the Lord would inflict upon the nations the punishment they deserve for having oppressed the chosen people. Along with other crimes, they took over the land, sold the people as slaves, and pillaged God's treasures to adorn foreign temples/palaces (vv. 5–6). The Lord would repay them by inflicting on them the same evil deeds they had inflicted on His people. While Tyre, Sidon, Philistia, Edom, and Egypt are mentioned, no reference is made to Assyria or Babylonia. The prophetic message, however, summons all the nations (v. 11), an indication that these political and ethnic entities function as a sampling of a much larger gathering of enemy nations for the eschatological judgment.

The Valley of Jehoshaphat (vv. 2, 12) is not mentioned anywhere else in the OT, and its location, if it is a literal place, is unknown. Two observations suggest that the name may be symbolic. First, the name Jehoshaphat means "the Lord judges," making it a most appropriate designation for a place of judgment. Second, the name "Valley of Jehoshaphat" calls to mind the Valley of Berakah, where God defeated a coalition of enemy nations on behalf of Jehoshaphat, the king of Judah (2 Chr. 20:26). Regardless, the appellation "Valley of Jehoshaphat" most likely points to the universal judgment of the nations, not to the place of its occurrence. Significantly, Joel also calls the same location "the valley of decision" (Joel 3:14), which points to God's decision to punish the nations for their crimes against His people. A harvest scene also portrays the same event. The command to put in/swing the sickle and come down to trample the grapes (v. 13), which was probably addressed to the angelic host (Ps. 103:20; Zech. 14:5), portrays a frightening image of punishment (Is. 63:1–6). Again the prophet associates cosmic signs with the eschatological Day of the Lord. The darkening

Outpouring of the Spirit

According to Peter, the outpouring of the Spirit on the small group of disciples during Pentecost fulfilled Joel's prophecy (Acts 2:16–21). God poured out the Spirit even on Gentiles (Acts 10:44–45). The work of the salvation of Christ and the coming of the Spirit inaugurated a new age. But Pentecost was only a partial fulfillment that signaled the ushering in of the eschatological era. Joel pointed not only to the inauguration of the age of salvation but also to its consummation on the Day of the Lord. He described cosmic signs, which Jesus associated with His Second Coming—the ultimate Day of the Lord (Matt. 24:29; cf. Rev. 6:12). According to the NT, the judgment of the nations mentioned in Joel 3:1–2 will take place at the close of the cosmic conflict (Rev. 20:7–15). The partial fulfillment during Pentecost points to the future fulfillment of all elements of the prophecy in preparation for and in connection with the coming of the Lord. The initial outpouring of the Spirit at Pentecost will intensify in a unique way to prepare God's people (His end-time remnant) and the world for the final events leading to the glorious return of Christ (cf. Rev. 12:17; 19:10; 22:17). At that time, God's people will find refuge on Mount Zion (Rev. 14:1). The coming of the Spirit at Pentecost was like the early rain, and His intensified and glorious manifestation at the end will be like the latter rain that matures the crops for the harvest (Joel 2:23; Rev. 14:14–20; 18:1; cf. Is. 44:3). Joel compresses a large sweep of salvation history into a short description. The outpouring of the Spirit, the cosmic signs and earthly portents, the remnant on Mount Zion, and the judgment of the nations all refer to a cluster of eschatological entities and events, covering a significant span of history leading to the end. of the sun and moon, along with the dimming of the stars, further emphasizes the seriousness of that day (Joel 3:15). If the created order quakes before such a powerful Judge (v. 16), the enemy armies stand no chance of success.

While the enemy would receive due punishment, God would reconfirm Israel as the covenant people. The Lord reassured them that He was their God, who dwells in Zion (v. 17). God encamped among His people during the Exodus and subsequently chose Zion to be His permanent dwelling among them. The promise that by no means would any alien/foreigner pass through Zion implies the exclusion of Gentiles. It means that Zion, as a holy city, would be off-limits to unclean and rebellious people. To those who call on the name of the Lord, the city would remain shelter and home (2:32; Zech. 14:17; Heb. 12:22; Rev. 21:1–3, 27).

3:18–21. Description of the Blessings. Joel ends his book by announcing a glorious future for God's people. The blessings of "that day" (3:18), the eschatological age, would reverse all the disasters lamented in the beginning of the book. The lack of wine (1:5) would give way to vineyards that would produce rivers of grape juice. The formerly starving cattle (1:18) would have so much pasture that copious streams of milk would flow from the hills. The dry brooks (1:17–20) would overflow with abundant water. And the temple, previously deprived of joy (1:9, 13, 16), would become a source of living water (cf. Ezek. 47:1–12) irrigating the arid Valley of Shittim/acacias. (Acacias usually grow in arid and infertile soil.) This valley was likely a continuation of the Kidron Valley that runs down to the Dead Sea; however, the emphasis does not lie on its geographical location but on the paradisaical life-giving waters that would flow from the temple in eschatological times. This image points back to the river in the Garden of Eden and forward to the river of life flowing from the throne of God in the new Jerusalem (Rev. 22:1–2).

In contrast, Egypt—in spite of the Nile River—and Edom would become desolate places because of the crimes committed against God's people (Joel 3:19). These two nations, persistent adversaries of Israel and Judah, symbolize the enemies of God and His people. In concrete language, the prophet affirms that the restoration of God's people would entail the removal of all threats to their security. So Joel closes his book with a message of hope and deliverance: Judah and Jerusalem would stand forever because the Lord dwells in Zion (vv. 20–21).

AMOS

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The opening verse attributes the book to the Prophet Amos, whose name derives from the Hebrew verb 'amas and means “carried,” “supported,” “lifted,” or “saved” (i.e., by the Lord; cf. Ps. 68:19; Is. 46:3). The name alludes to the message of the book: the Lord will preserve those who repent, trust in God, and love justice and mercy. Amos was from Tekoa, a fortified city south of Bethlehem (Amos 1:1; cf. 2 Chr. 11:5). He worked primarily as a noqed (1:1; a term that appears elsewhere in the Hebrew Bible only in 2 Kin. 3:4), a shepherd who may have been involved with breeding sheep. God chose him as a prophet for the Northern Kingdom of Israel (Amos 7:15).

Date. Amos prophesied during the reigns of Uzziah, king of Judah (792–740 B.C.), and Jeroboam II, king of Israel (793–753 B.C.; 1:1). This would place his ministry between 792 B.C. and 753 B.C.

Backgrounds. The reign of Jeroboam II was a time of territorial expansion, peace, and prosperity. He reconquered the Transjordanian region of Israel, including Damascus, Lebo Hamath, Lo Debar, Karnaim, and the Sea/Valley of Arabah. This proved a token of divine mercy, for it secured Israel’s existence a little longer (6:13–14; 2 Kin. 14:23–29). Hegemony over these lands led the kingdom to the zenith of its power and affluence (see Amos 3:10–12, 15; 4:1; 5:11, 17; 6:4–6, 11). Archaeologists have found written documents from that time that record the delivery of quality wine and fine oil as (tax) payments to the capital city (cf. 2:8), shedding light on the extensive production of wine and oil in the region. Unfortunately, however, religious syncretism marred the reign of Jeroboam II, corrupting the worship of the Lord and perverting justice and mercy. Indeed, Samaria sinned through the monumental cultic centers

(i.e., sanctuaries) that Jeroboam I had set up at Dan and Bethel to house the two golden calves (7:13; 8:14; 1 Kin. 12:25–33; 2 Kin. 14:24).

Theology and Purpose. God sent Amos to the Northern Kingdom with a message of final judgment, though one not totally devoid of hope. The book has three main theological themes.

1. God’s Righteousness. The book of Amos contains three beautiful doxologies describing God’s power and proclaiming Him as Lord over the created world (4:13; 5:8–9; 9:5–6). This monotheistic and universalistic understanding of God explains His intervention within history. For Amos, God is Lord over nature because He created it and can therefore uncreate it (4:13). The second and third doxologies communicate the same idea (5:8–9; 9:5–6). But between the act of creation and the act of judgment comes an act of revelation. The transcendental and powerful God of Creation willingly speaks to humans. He led Israel out of Egypt, protected them in the wilderness for forty years, and guided them through His prophets (2:10–11; 3:1). But He is also Lord over all nations, overseeing and guiding their movements (9:7). The One who raises up nations (6:14) and brings them down (2:9) controls the political and military achievements of these nations. As the moral Judge of both Israel and the nations, He cares about proper interpersonal relations among human beings and reacts against the oppression of the poor and the needy. He is not indifferent to social evils but requires that His people live in righteousness (5:24).

2. Social Justice. Amos speaks against social injustices, showing the importance of proper social behavior in the eyes of the Lord. Religion cannot be divorced from respect for other human beings. He decries Israel’s inability to understand what was honest and right (3:10). God expected them to let justice run down like a river of water and righteousness like an ever-flowing, mighty stream (5:24), but instead they turned justice into bitterness and threw righteousness to the ground (5:7). They transgressed through court procedures, the accumulation of wealth, and worship. Amos criticizes the court procedures at the city's gate because they abused the poor and the innocent and refused to recognize their rights (2:6–8). Those in power economically abused the poor (5:11) and hated those who stood up to defend them (5:10). They accepted bribes (5:12) and turned justice into venom and righteousness into the bitterness of wormwood (6:12). Amos condemns the lifestyle of the upper classes because the poor suffered as a result of their greed (4:1).

Chapters 1–2 also address the problem of social injustice among the nations. The Lord condemned Damascus for its treatment of prisoners of war (1:3; cf. 2 Kin. 10:32–33), Gaza and Edom for selling slaves for economic gain (Amos 1:6, 9), Ammon for ripping open the pregnant women of Gilead (1:13), and Moab for showing total disrespect for human remains (2:1). God is not indifferent to such crimes against humanity.

Amos also attacks Israel's religious practices. The upper class appeared very religious, offering many sacrifices to the Lord (4:5; 5:21–23). But the Lord rejected their sacrifices not only because the people offered them in Bethel and Gilgal (4:4) but also because they did not practice social justice (5:23–24). Social injustices, a violation of the covenant, tainted their offerings and songs. Our relationship with God should transform the way we relate to our fellow human beings. If it does not, then we are not properly relating to God, even though we may follow the external forms of religion.

3. Judgment and Hope. The Lord would put an end to the social injustices practiced in Israel. The luxurious mansions of the upper classes would be destroyed (3:15), and the proud wives of the wealthy would go into captivity (4:2–3). The Lord would raise His sword against the house of Jeroboam (7:9) and destroy the altar at Bethel (3:14), resulting in weeping and mourning (5:16–17). Amos never identifies the instrument of judgment (Assyria), but he makes it clear that a military power (3:11; 5:5; 6:14) would take the people into captivity (5:7, 27; 6:7). Amos did not doubt that Israel would be led away captive (7:17). The Lord had done all He could to bring them back to repentance, but they refused to listen (4:6–11).

Amos calls that day of destruction “the day of the LORD” (5:18, 20). The popular theology in Amos's days defined the Day of the Lord as the future punishment and destruction of Israel's enemies. The people looked forward to that day as a day of liberation. But Amos redefined it as a day when the Lord would confront Israel because of their sins, a day of darkness and destruction for His people (5:18–20; 8:3). The religious festivals would end (8:10), strange natural phenomena would occur (8:9), an earthquake would destroy many, and those who survived would be killed with the sword (9:1). God would preserve only a very small remnant, first described as the survivors of the catastrophe (historical remnant) and then as those willing to seek the Lord (faithful remnant; 5:6). But because of the severe nature of Israel's sins, the remnant who survived would not necessarily suffice to perpetuate the nation (5:14). Yet, a note of hope remained: God might have mercy on the remnant of Joseph (5:15).

This opens the door to a hopeful future. The Day of the Lord would not result in the extermination of God's people. The book of Amos ends on a positive note (9:11–15). God would restore David's kingdom, the united monarchy, and bring the nations under the rule of the future David. The true eschatological remnant embraces peoples from all nations who willingly submit to the rule of the Messiah under the new Davidic covenant. The rule of the new David would bring fertility and blessings. The exiled ones would return to their own land, never again to be removed from it (9:15). Thus, the book of Amos, which proclaims judgment, ends with a proclamation of hope that looks to the future establishment of social, moral, and religious justice once and for all.

Literary Features. Amos uses characteristic oracles, sayings, and vision reports to communicate judgment against Israel and hope for the remnant. These include features such as numerical formulas (see 1:3, 6), rhetorical questions (3:3), metaphors (4:1), taunts (4:4–5), allusions (4:10–11), and laments (5:2).

COMMENTARY

1:1—2:16

SUPERScription AND ORACLES AGAINST THE NATIONS

After the superscription (1:1–2), the first occurrence of the messenger formula (1:3) declares the divine origin of the prophecy. The Lord is speaking. He unveils the transgressions of eight nations and passes judgment against them. These transgressions include the practice of lawlessness and violence and the violation of common social laws protecting the life of the innocent and the rights of the weak (Ex. 23:7; Deut. 24:14; Prov. 14:31; 22:16). The Lord specifically charged them with genocide, corpse desecration, brutality, and a lack of compassion (Amos 1:3–2:16; Ps. 11:5). Such transgressions brought about the Flood (Gen. 6:11, 13). As in the days of Noah, God would again decimate the wicked. The oracles against the nations contain three important elements. First, the ascending numerical sequence (“three...four”) lists three despicable transgressions plus a fourth climactic condition that exceeds the limit of God’s forbearance. Second, this formula of irrevocability stresses that God had determined not to avert His judgment and would inevitably pour out His wrath. Third, God would use fire to target the buildings that provided the inhabitants with a sense of power and security: temples, altars, fortresses, and palaces.

1:1–2. Superscription. The opening phrase refers to the book as “the words of Amos” instead of the more common “the word of the LORD” in other prophetic books. Only Jeremiah uses the same formula (Jer. 1:1; 36:10; 51:64). However, these words of divine revelation came to him from the Lord. Amos had no prophetic pedigree, but he willingly obeyed God. Amos 1:2 introduces the theological theme of the Day of the Lord by describing God as a lion roaring from Zion. His roar causes nature to wither, even to the top of Carmel, a place famous in Israel’s history for deliverance from a drought (1 Kin. 18:41–46). From the outset, the book prophesies divine judgment (see “God’s Judgment in the Prophets,” p. 981).

1:3–8. Damascus and Gaza. The Aramaeans fought with the Northern Kingdom over possession of Gilead, the region to the east of the Jordan River. This continued for decades until Jeroboam II put an end to the wars (1 Kin. 15:16–22; 2 Kin. 14:28; 2 Chr. 16:1–6). In Amos, Gilead refers to the land and its inhabitants, who suffered brutal attacks. Hazael and Ben-Hadad represent two dynastic titles rather than different kings (Amos 1:4). God would directly punish the leadership and the public edifices but send most of the population into exile to Kir as a historical remnant (v. 5; 9:7).

The Philistines settled in the southwestern portion of the Holy Land, where they established a confederation of five city-states, each under a lord, mostly along the coastal plain. Among these city-states, Gaza was the leading power. Beginning in the period of the Judges, this confederation constantly fought with the Israelites. Later, David, Solomon, and Uzziah all subjugated them. In the interest of economic gain, the Philistines engaged in the slave trade and human trafficking, probably perpetrated against the people of Judah (1:6; cf. 2 Chr. 28:18; Ezek. 27:13; Joel 3:6–7). They sold the slaves to the Edomites to work in their copper mines. As with the Aramaeans, the Philistines’ punishment would target mainly the structures and the ruling class. The destruction of the remaining Philistines does not refer to the whole population but to the army and leaders (Amos 1:8).

1:9–12. Tyre and Edom. Tyre was the chief city of the Phoenician city-states. God accused the Phoenicians of complicity in the slave commerce (v. 9). Together with the Philistines, they plotted against the Israelites (Ps. 83:4–6), thereby violating the covenant made with David, Solomon, and, later, Ahab (2 Sam. 5:11; 1 Kin. 5:1, 7–11; 9:13–14; 2 Chr. 2:11–16). As punishment, God would send an inferno upon the city wall and fortresses (Amos 1:10).

Edom is another name for Esau (Gen. 25:30), who lived in conflict with his brother, Jacob (Gen. 27:40). The Edomites had acted unbrotherly toward the Israelites since the time of their ancestor, and this continued in the time of Amos and beyond (cf. Obad. 10–16). The Lord indicted them for cruelty and deadly persecution of Israel (Amos 1:11). As the sentence, a blaze would consume the main fortresses of the kingdom, signaling the collapse and permanent defeat of the nation (v. 12). The fire refers to a military attack.

1:13–2:3. Ammon and Moab. The people of Ammon were the descendants of Ben-Ammi, a son of Lot (Gen. 19:30–38). During the conquest of Canaan, God explicitly ordered the Israelites not to attack them (Deut. 2:19, 37). Despite this privilege, the Ammonites often showed animosity toward the Israelites and sought to take over their territory (Judg. 11; 1 Sam. 11; 2 Sam. 10:1–19; 2 Chr. 20:1–30) until Uzziah subdued them (2 Chr. 26:8; 27:5). They committed a heinous genocide against the pregnant Israelite women from Gilead (Amos 1:13). Consequently, God’s inferno would consume their military defenses and political structures. The king and his officials would go into exile as a historical remnant (vv. 14–15).

Moab was the brother of Ben-Ammi and the ancestor of the Moabites (Gen. 19:30-38). Moab and Edom were relatives through Lot and Isaac. Biblical history depicts them as a pair of powers inhospitable toward Israel (Judg. 11:17-18), but they would ultimately be defeated (Ex. 15:15; Num. 24:17; 1 Chr. 18:2). On one occasion the king of Edom joined forces with King Jehoram of Israel and King Jehoshaphat of Judah against Moab. This alliance led King Mesha of Moab to sacrifice his crown prince as a burnt offering (2 Kin. 3:26-27). The burning of the bones of the king of Edom attests to great hatred (Amos 2:1). According to the expression's common usage, the destruction of Moab may designate the army, soldiers, leaders, or strongholds (v. 2; cf. Num. 22:14; Judg. 3:28-29; 2 Kin. 3:22-24). On account of their transgressions, the Lord would burn down their fortresses and annihilate their king and his officials (Amos 2:2-3).

2:4-5. Judah. Whereas the Lord charged foreign nations with very specific transgressions against humanity, He condemned Judah because they ma'asam ("despised," "rejected") His law (v. 4). However, the nature of the punishment placed Judah alongside the foreign nations under the same destiny. Judah disobeyed by perverting justice and mercy. To ma'as ("despise," "reject") the law of God generally means reversing the values of justice, goodness, and mercy rooted in God's commandments (cf. Ex. 18:16, 20; Deut. 5:1-21). In Amos it refers to such wrongs as false oaths, deception, bribery, extortion, theft, adultery, murder, and bloodshed. The lies of false prophets, priests, and officials had superseded God's laws (Amos 2:4). These lies typify a form of speech and behavior that wears the deceptive appearances of truth (cf. Hos. 4:1-2, 6). Like the other nations, Judah's sentence included the burning of its palaces.

2:6-16. Israel. The previous oracles pave the way for a thorough indictment of the Northern Kingdom of Israel. The Lord accused Israel of crimes similar in nature to those of the foreign nations, in that they exploited the weak. But even worse, the Israelites perpetrated these crimes against their own people. Since the divine law embodied justice and mercy, these crimes should be viewed against a legal background. The guilty party, always referred to in the plural, frequently represents the government, the high social classes, and the religious elite. Amos chronicles brazen crimes, often perpetrated at the gate of the city; that is, the courthouse and center of commercial and civic activity (3:10; 5:7, 10, 12, 15). As to Israel's relationship with God, Amos records how Israel forgot and forsook their Maker (cf. Hos. 2:13; 8:14), rebelled against His law and the prophetic word, and broke His covenant (Amos 2:11-12; 7:13; 2 Kin. 17:15-16; 18:12; Hos. 7:13; 8:1; cf. Num. 12:6; Deut. 18:15). Their moral violations included sexual relations with a girl by both a man and his father (Amos 2:7; Gen. 19:30-38; Lev. 18:6, 9; 20:17) and the transgression of the law of the Nazirite (Amos 2:11-12; Num. 6:3, 21).

As to the Israelites' relationship with each other, Amos chronicles how they denied the most vulnerable people justice by favoring the ruling class and by breeding corruption through bribes and dishonest scales (Amos 2:7-8; 4:1; 5:12; 8:4-5; Hos. 12:7, 8; cf. Lev. 19:15, 36). They infringed the laws that protect the defenseless (Ex. 23:7; Deut. 24:14; Prov. 14:31; 22:16). In other words, they overturned kindness and generosity (Deut. 15:7, 11; Hos. 6:4) by selling the righteous, the needy, and the poor into slavery for a pittance; imposing levies on them; charging interest on money lent to them (Amos 2:8; 5:11; cf. Ex. 22:22-24; Prov. 17:26); and keeping their pledges for loans overnight (Amos 2:8; cf. Deut. 24:12-13, 17).

Power, wealth, and security caused them to forget their roots and the way the Lord had led them in their journey from Egypt to the land of Canaan. When they were oppressed and persecuted, God saved them. When they were orphans and homeless, He gave them an inheritance (Amos 2:9-10). Now that they had become the oppressors and persecutors, God, in retribution, would bring the kingdom ruin and death on the Day of the Lord. The swift, the strong, the warrior, the archer, the fleet of foot, the rider, and the stouthearted would all fall victim. But despite the severity of the devastation, a bruised remnant would remain as Israel's hope for survival.

3:1-6:14

ORACLES AGAINST ISRAEL

3:1-15

Ruin and Survival

Amos 3:1-15 articulates divine justice and mercy, retribution for iniquities, and the preservation of a remnant torn into pieces.

3:1–8. The Revelation of Judgment. In Amos 3:1–8 the Lord speaks against Israel, whom He had brought out of Egypt. The revelation of God's grace requires fidelity on the part of those who receive it (vv. 1–2). The Exodus from Egypt, His care for His people during their wilderness travels, the covenant at Sinai, and the inheritance of the land all attest to God's mercy. Israel's election did not grant the nation an unconditional covenant relationship. The covenant required them to reciprocate God's love and behavior. As their Redeemer, God was justified in disciplining His people. Amos artfully represents retributive judgment through a list of causes and effects, moving from imagery to reality. The images of the lion, the hunter, and the trumpet portray God's refusal to continue leading Israel as their Shepherd. Because they had entangled themselves in their own paths instead of seeking Him, the unexpected would happen. God would turn against them like a hungry lion and like a hunter laying a trap. Israel would become His prey (vv. 3–5). The blowing trumpet heralds God's presence as an enemy. In the past, the personal manifestation of God served to instill the people with fear so that they might not sin (Ex. 20:20). However, another theophany in the near future would effect ruin upon the nation. Previously, the people had trembled in awe; now they would tremble in terror for their lives. But God did not leave His people in darkness, unaware of His plans. Before the execution of judgment, He sent a prophet to them to warn them about the coming disaster and to urge repentance (Amos 3:7–8; 5:4–6). Despite any opposition to prophesying (2:12), God would ultimately succeed in conveying His message.

3:9–12. The Sentence and Promise of a Remnant. Before imposing a sentence, God summoned eyewitnesses in compliance with Israelite law, which required two witnesses for a conviction for a crime (v. 9; cf. Deut. 17:6; 19:15; cf. 1 Kin. 21:10). He probably summoned the Philistines and the Egyptians because of their historical status as known oppressors. They could therefore give competent testimony to support the legality of the penalty. The Lord would execute judgment on those who stored up ill-gotten plunder in their fortresses (Amos 3:10). He would send an adversary as His instrument to invade the land, take its wealth, and plunder its palaces (v. 11).

The Lord compares the coming experience of Israel to that of a shepherd facing a voracious lion (v. 12). The passage portrays the Lord as both Shepherd and Lion, both the Condemner and the Defender of His people. In His wrath, God would decimate the sinful leaders of the kingdom to the extent that the residue of human resources would not suffice for the recovery of the nation (9:8, 10). But in His grace, He would save a historical remnant, survivors of trauma and loss, as a shepherd saves a bruised and mutilated sheep (3:12). In antiquity, when a wild beast killed a domestic animal, a hired shepherd had to present evidence of the loss. The smallest rescued pieces could serve as proof that the shepherd had not stolen the animal. Likewise, the mention of the corner of a bed and the foot of a couch indicates that an insignificant amount of the wealth of Samaria would remain. Even though God would disempower Israel's leadership and deplete their material resources, a bruised and almost useless remnant would remain. Those who remained in the land would probably comprise commoners and patricians. Thus, the land was occupied by shepherds, farmers, fugitive soldiers, war survivors, professional lamenters, palace singers, and relatives of the dead officials (1:2; 2:14–16; 5:3; 5:16; 6:9–10; 8:3; 2 Chr. 30:1, 6–12; 34:6–9). Those in the diaspora would mainly include members of the religious, military, and political aristocracy as well as their families (Amos 4:1–3; 2 Kin. 17:27–28). But God intended to transform them into a faithful eschatological remnant (see Amos 5:14–15).

3:13–15. Evidence against Israel. God continues presenting the evidence against the nation and describes in more detail the punishment that would follow. He does not identify the invaders but describes their onslaught here. The conquerors would dismantle the religious and political centers of the nation and demolish the altar and its horns, destroying the Bethel sanctuary (v. 14). The invader would also destroy the splendid residences of the aristocracy, mansions and houses adorned and decorated with ivory (v. 15; 1 Kin. 22:39). Excavations at Samaria have unearthed the opulence of these precincts with their plethora of ivory inlays. The imminent devastation combined with the preservation of a remnant (Amos 3:12) expresses the two sides of God's character: justice and mercy.

4:1–13

Refusal to Repent

This prophecy justifies the irrevocable stroke of divine retribution upon Israel. Despite various divine warnings, they refused to repent of their heinous religious and moral misconduct. God rebukes the entire population and especially the authorities of Israel, who had oppressed the needy.

4:1–3. Judgment on the Social Elite. The designation “cows of Bashan” calls to mind the fertile plain in Transjordan known as Bashan, where cows grew well-fed, plump, and healthy (v. 1; cf. Deut. 32:14; Ps. 22:12; Ezek. 39:18). The “cows” are generally understood to denote the leading women of Samaria. However, they may well represent the overindulged and defiant chiefs (cf. Hos. 4:4–6, 16; 5:1; 10:11), who fattened themselves on the poor. Bashan stands for the rich kingdom. The husbands/lords with whom they wished to feast and celebrate their ill-gotten fortune were probably their peers in the regime (Amos 4:1). The title ’adon (“master,” “lord”) not only denotes the servant/master relationship but also, less frequently, refers to an esteemed and respected social equal (Gen. 23:6, 11; 32:5–6, 18; 33:8). That is probably the meaning intended here. God describes the coming punishment of the wealthy oppressors using the painful image of fishhooks, representing military defeat (Amos 4:2–3).

4:4–5. False Worship. The Lord next presented the list of transgressions requiring requital. The first transgression was their religious and moral duplicity. The panacea of ritual behavior, manifested in the presentation of animal sacrifices, tithes, and thanksgiving and freewill offerings, substituted for moral behavior. They performed these ritual enactments on a daily basis and every three days at the shrines of Bethel and Gilgal, places of religious importance throughout Israel’s history (Gen. 12:8; 28:10–22; 35:1–8; Josh. 4:19–20; 5:2–12; 1 Sam. 7:15–17; 11:14–15). Out of the two, Bethel was the primary national sanctuary in the Northern Kingdom at the time of Amos (Amos 7:13; cf. 1 Kin. 12:26–33). The sarcastic invitation to sin/transgress by bringing sacrifices to the cultic centers serves as a parody of justice and mercy. The leaders apparently assumed that after performing the established rites through which they obtained forgiveness, they could still go on sinning. Ironically, they enacted these rights to compensate for their injustice and exploitation of the vulnerable. Intellectual assent to faith and devotion to religious practices may help to arouse spirituality, but they alone do not avail before God. However, if coupled with repentance, trust, and a moral life in accordance with God’s will, they become a blessing. That theoretically sound religion had so little impact on their lives is a travesty. Consequently, the prophet rails heavily against the rupture of cult and moral conduct.

However, although other prophets list idolatry as one of the causes of Israel’s fall (2 Kin. 17:5–23; Hos. 2:8, 15, 19; 4:17), Amos does not stress this (but see Amos 5:26). He grapples with the core of the problem: the separation of worship and divine moral standards (i.e., formalistic ritualism devoid of the true fear of the Lord) that results in idolatry and merely human standards (5:4–6, 25–26). Idolatry replaces the image of God, whereas lawlessness and violence deface that image.

4:6–11. Human Impenitence. The second transgression requiring divine requital was willful and obstinate impenitence. Before sending Amos, God had sent seven temporary calamities against the Israelites to condemn their sins, move them to repentance, and restore them. Each calamity represented a preamble of judgment which, if abided by, would have revoked the next calamity and, ultimately, the retribution. Unfortunately, every one of them proved ineffective. First, God sent a famine that covered the entire land (v. 6). Second, He sent a tragic drought (vv. 7–8; 1 Kin. 17:1, 7; 18:5–6). Because He withheld the latter rains three months prior to the harvest in May and June, the yield of crops failed. Moreover, wells and cisterns dried up, causing some people to search for water in other places. But they could not quench their thirst. Despite the havoc, evidence exists that God cared for and protected righteous individuals, such as Elijah, the seven thousand, the widow of Zarephath, and Obadiah (1 Kin. 17:1–24; 18:3–4, 7–8, 12, 16; 19:18). The third and fourth plagues struck the cereal crops (Amos 4:9). Damaging winds of blight (scorching desert winds from the east) and mildew (humid winds from the west) caused the desiccation and withering of the crops (cf. Gen. 41:6; Hag. 2:17). Locusts devoured the most important agricultural products of the land: gardens, vineyards, and fig and olive trees. The fifth scourge, pestilence, alludes to a similar disaster that struck the livestock and the population of Egypt (Amos 4:10; Ex. 9:3–7, 15). Sixth, the Lord slew the young soldiers, together with their captive horses, in the course of battle. The direst of all the calamities occurred last (Amos 4:11). The Lord compares the devastation to that which befell Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 19:25, 29), emphasizing the state of ruin of some of Israel's lands, probably resulting from war. But most of the people remained alive. Apparently, some lands and properties were destroyed, but God, as a token of divine grace, saved the leaders and the population from death's door, like a firebrand plucked from the fire (Amos 4:11). The divine characteristics of justice and mercy always give hope to God's people.

4:12–13. Meeting the Lord. Having presented the evidence for all to see, the Lord found the Israelites guilty of committing willful, brazen transgressions and of resisting His calls to return. After ignoring numerous admonitions, they had missed the opportunity to return to God. Consequently, God signed the sentence. He would not send another announcement of judgment because the final hour was at hand. This dramatic situation mirrors the plagues executed against Egypt. Pharaoh did not heed the warnings of the calamities, hardening his heart instead of relenting. Therefore, the hour came when the Lord brought the worst of the plagues, the death of the firstborn. Paradoxically, those who had once endured Egypt's oppression had now become the oppressors, the embodiment of Pharaoh. Instead of calling for repentance again, the Lord summoned them to the theophany of the "Day of the LORD," a day of divine retribution (4:12). As Creator and Warrior (v. 13), He would mobilize an enemy nation against Israel to forcibly deport the (surviving) members of the aristocracy, the historical remnant, into exile (3:11; 4:2–3). The oath formula stresses the irreversibility and finality of the Day of the Lord: God has sworn by His holiness (4:2).

5:1–27

Justice and Mercy

Amos 5:1–27 portrays God's justice and mercy through the manifestation of the "Day of the Lord" and the establishment of a righteous remnant at the end. Ancient Israel understood justice and mercy to be character traits of God (Job 37:23; Pss. 33:5; 89:14; 103:6; Is. 5:16; Jer. 9:24) that He also required of His people (Pss. 72:1; 106:3; Ezek. 18:5; Mic. 6:8; Zech. 7:9), especially a leader (king, ruler, judge, etc.). These traits served to harmoniously preserve order in society. Justice and mercy refer first and foremost to the establishment of justice, the restoration of morality, and the protection and deliverance of the weak. As Judge and Lawgiver, God used Moses and Aaron to give

His people laws that embody justice and mercy (Ps. 99:6–7; Is. 33:22). He commanded any future king to fear Him and obey His commandments, learning them by heart and reading them all the days of his life (Deut. 17:14–20). In Amos, the opposite of justice and mercy is lawlessness (khamas) and violence (shod; Amos 3:10; 6:3). The transgression of these pillars of society sets in motion God's justice and mercy in a context of judgment, condemnation, and salvation.

5:1–9. Lament and Call. In a short lament, the prophet announces that the Northern Kingdom would never rise again. Only ten percent of the population would survive the decimation of the cities and towns (vv. 2–3). Based on the lament, the Lord called the people to seek Him and not go to Bethel and Gilgal, their centers of false worship. Gilgal would go into exile and Bethel would be totally desolated (vv. 4–5). If the people wanted to live, they had to obey the Lord's urgent call. Otherwise, He would break out like fire to devour the house of Joseph (v. 6). The fire would be unquenchable on account of the people's perversion of justice and righteousness on the earth.

Seeking the Lord implies repenting, returning to God, and trusting in His salvation and providence instead of in self-sufficiency, human power, or a religious system (4:6, 8–11; 5:4–6, 22–23; 6:1, 13). It also connotes a total dedication to a moral life; that is, seeking and loving justice and mercy (5:7, 24; 6:12). Although the sinful kingdom of Israel would inevitably meet its end, God offered life to all on an individual basis. As the Creator and Sustainer of the earth, the Lord has the power to destroy the strong and accomplish His design (5:9).

5:10–15. Sin, the Lord, and the Remnant.

Amos provides more specific reasons to seek the Lord—all of them based on the sins of the powerful. The gates served as places where the poor and needy could seek justice, but those in power were not interested in justice. They hated those who spoke the truth (v. 10). The powerful exploited the poor. They selfishly acquired wealth to build beautiful houses and plant wonderful vineyards. But because of the impending catastrophe, they would not live in those houses or drink wine from those vineyards. The Lord knew very well that they lacked integrity and abused the poor. Many quietly suffered under such evil circumstances (v. 13). The only way out was for the people to stop and seek good instead of evil so that they might live (v. 14).

The call to seek the Lord transitions the topic back to the remnant. The historical remnant, introduced in vv. 1–3, could become a righteous (eschatological) remnant, crediting their existence to God's grace (vv. 14–15). In this case the Hebrew term 'ulai ("perhaps," "it may be") could mean "hopefully," denoting a hope rooted in God's generosity/mercy and, therefore, likely to happen (Gen. 16:2; 32:21; 1 Sam. 9:7; 14:6, 12–14; Zeph. 2:3). The hope of justice being restored at the gate resided with them.

5:16–27. The Day of the Lord. The Lord announces the Day of the Lord by describing the wailing that would occur throughout the land (v. 16). Those who expected its coming hoped for the light of a new day, but they would be surprised to receive absolute darkness (v. 18). God compared the terrors of that day to running from a lion only to find a bear ahead or finding safety at home only to be bitten by a snake while leaning on the wall (v. 19). He would bring military defeat (vv. 2–3, 9) and exile beyond the territory of Aram (v. 27) to destroy the oppressors in Israel, as well as their sources of power and wealth (v. 17).

The last part of Amos 5 returns to the topic of worship in the context of the Day of the Lord, as if to provide another reason for that event. Since His people had separated ritual performance from justice, the Lord rejected their celebrations of the annual festivals, their sacrifices, and their songs of praise (vv. 21–24). He posed a rhetorical question to underline the limited value of sacrifices (v. 25). During the wilderness period, the people and God enjoyed a strong relationship without an emphasis on sacrifices. Thus, a righteous life took priority over nominal, ritual practices. Verse 26 is difficult to interpret. It could refer to a "shrine," a "tabernacle," or "the pedestal for an idol," but it more likely refers to the specific names of two astral deities. On the Day of the Lord, the people and their gods would go into exile together.

6:1–14

Inwardly-Directed Attitudes

This oracle addressed the distinguished elite of Zion (cf. 2:4–5) and Samaria (cf. 3:12, 15; 4:1), who lived a carefree and secure lifestyle. Overall, Amos condemns core sentiments because they thwarted any recognition of personal sin and shut off the voice of God.

6:1–8. People at Ease. The Israelites experienced all the ease, comfort, and security that material prosperity, military strength, and systematic religion could provide. But Amos called them to reflect on what was happening around them—to go and observe Calneh (also Kalneh), Hamath, and Gath (v. 2). The Assyrians destroyed Calneh and Hamath, while Gath fell to King Uzziah of Judah (2 Chr. 26:6). The Israelites were not superior to or better off than these defeated kingdoms. They, too, would soon receive the onslaught of the Assyrian blow.

Pleasure and excess were the hallmarks of Israelite society. The selfish pursuit of luxury, idleness, gluttony, and extravagance in drinking and music hindered fellowship with God. The rich lounged on couches decorated with precious ivory, ate the best meat, and lavishly imbibed wine, all while listening to soothing music played on harps. They anointed themselves with the finest oils and used cosmetics as a sign of self-sufficiency and wealth (Amos 6:4–6). In v. 3, Amos uses the phrase yom ra' as another name for the Day of the Lord. The term ra' often means "evil," but it can also connote the idea of "calamity," "doom," or "disaster." In addition to the lack of justice and mercy (vv. 3, 12), their privileged attitudes and sheer lack of concern over the imminent calamity (v. 6) provoked the divine visitation.

Self-confidence and self-indulgence left little room for God (v. 8). The army of Samaria was alienated from God, following its own military interest. They viewed their conquest of Lo Debar and Karnaim as a testament to their military strength (v. 13). The Lord abhorred their pride (a form of idolatry; v. 8; cf. Prov. 8:13) and was ready to destroy the palace and the city (Amos 5:21–23; 6:8).

6:8–14. Demolition of Houses. Through the agency of another nation, God would bring Israel to its knees. The enemy would demolish their houses; annihilate the wicked chiefs, their wives, and their children; and deport the people into captivity (6:7–9, 11; 7:17). The oppression would reach all the way to the northern and southern boundaries of the Northern Kingdom, the entrance of Hamath/Lebo Hamath, and the Valley of the Arabah (6:14; 2 Kin. 14:25). They would lose all the land they had previously reconquered. However, as a token of divine mercy, a remnant would survive. The remnant would include relatives who would perform the burial ceremonies for the dead chiefs (cf. 1 Sam. 31:12–13; 2 Chr. 16:14; 21:19). Because of death's pollution, they would not invoke the name of the Lord in the houses of the deceased (Amos 6:9–10).

7:1—8:15

VISIONS OF DIVINE RETRIBUTION

7:1–17

Mercy for Israel and Justice for Evildoers

The visions in Amos 7:1–17 focus on God's use of the natural world and human affairs as agents to judge His people. The Lord did not expunge Israel's guilt, but He alleviated the punishment. He expressed both justice and kindness in determining to destroy property and the evildoers and to exile others. Amos trusted in the righteousness of God's judgment.

7:1–6. Locusts and Fire. The plague of locusts Amos saw would threaten the agricultural land. The late crop was the harvest after the late spring rains (v. 1; Ex. 10:15). It consisted of vegetables and other non-grain produce. A locust attack on the crop would create an agricultural disaster, potentially resulting in a famine so devastating that the entire population would die, leaving no surviving remnant. Therefore, Amos interceded for the people, and God listened to him.

Blazing fire and heat would cause the desiccation of the soil, resulting in a drought. These conditions would also lead to hunger and the extermination of the people. Consequently, Amos again interceded on behalf of the remnant, and God, in His mercy, listened to him. These visions reveal God's divine disposition to show mercy to His people.

7:7–9. The Plumb Line. Amos's third vision is difficult to interpret because the meaning of the Hebrew term 'anak, traditionally rendered "plumb line," is uncertain. It appears only in this passage. Scholars have found a similar Akkadian term (annaku) that means "tin," but they debate how this meaning would fit into the context of Amos. The translation "plumb line," an item used to construct a vertically straight wall, better fits the context. A plumb line has a weight that could have been made of tin. This could make "the tin" an idiom referring to a plumb line. In the vision, it represents God examining His people to establish whether they were morally and spiritually upright. He would no longer ignore or even forgive their sins (v. 8). The Lord would come as a Warrior with His sword against the dynasty of Jeroboam and would destroy their multiple places of worship (v. 9).

7:10–17. The Penalty. King Jeroboam and Amaziah the priest responded by opposing Amos's message. As a result, they and their offspring would receive the death penalty. Assyria would conquer the nation and exile some of the population (7:11, 17; 2 Kin. 15:29; 18:9–12).

8:1–14

Vision of the Summer Fruit

Amos's fourth vision proclaimed the end of Israel. The content of the vision itself precedes three oracles explaining its significance, each one introduced by "in that day" or a similar phrase (vv. 9, 11, 13).

8:1–8. Doomsday. The message of the vision revolves around a play on words. The Hebrew qayits ("summer fruit") and qets ("end") resemble each other in orthography and in pronunciation. Israel was like a summer fruit ready for the harvest, but that harvest symbolized its end, the collapse of the kingdom (vv. 1–3). This time Amos describes the judgment as carnage accompanied by natural phenomena and lamentation. Despite heaps of corpses strewn everywhere, the Lord would demand silence from all in recognition of their guilt and rebellion. No one would invoke the name of God, because He had brought about everything they experienced as punishment for their religious and moral duplicity (v. 3; cf. 5:13; 6:10; see commentary on 4:1–13; 5:1–9, 10–15, 16–27).

A focus on religious doctrine and ritual at the expense of God's moral demands resulted in lawlessness and violence. On the new moon (Num. 29:7; 2 Kin. 4:23; Is. 66:23; Hos. 2:11) the Israelites discontinued work and trade (Amos 8:5) as they did on the weekly Sabbath (Ex. 20:8–11; 23:12; 31:15; Lev. 23:3), but they violated the commandments requiring justice, mercy, and the use of honest scales, weights, and measures (Amos 8:5; cf. Lev. 19:35–36; Prov. 11:1; Ezek. 45:10–11). Merchants measured grain using an ephah smaller than the normal thirty-nine liters (10.3 gallons) but measured their payment using a shekel heavier than the normal eleven grams (.02 pounds or .39 ounces). Because of this fraud, the buyer received too little and paid too much. The merchants also sold the gleanings, the fallen grapes designated as food for the poor (Amos 8:6; Ex. 23:11; Lev. 19:10; 23:2; Deut. 15:9). The Lord would not forget or ignore the sins of the people and would act accordingly. The prophet's proclamation should have instilled fear in their hearts, but they apparently remained unimpressed (Amos 8:7–8).

8:9–10. Nature and Mourning. Divine retribution would take the form of an earthquake and a solar eclipse (8:9). The imagery of waters in upheaval (surging, swirling, and sinking) depicts the rise and fall of the earth's surface during an earthquake (9:5). The ancient world considered eclipses as representing the anger of the gods. These disasters would bring about a complete reversal of normal conditions. The people, possibly the professional “wailing women,” would chant dirges, and survivors would perform mourning rites as an expression of sorrow, national disaster, and loss of divine protection (8:10; cf. Jer. 9:17).

8:11–15. Expectation. Beginning with the phrase “the days are coming,” the oracle in Amos 8:11–15 suggests an intermediate phase of the Day of the Lord (see 5:1–3, 14–15), a time of spiritual awakening and crucial choices due to the unavailability of prophecy and shrines (8:11; cf. 1 Kin. 8:46–53). As an act of grace, the survivors would have another chance. The downfall of the political, economic, and religious powers would enable them to undergo a process of testing, shaking, and sifting (Amos 9:9), whether in the native land or in exile. Without sanctuary, ephod, teraphim, or oracle, God would be inaccessible (Hos. 3:4; 5:6), and the people would experience divine abandonment. While waiting for restoration, some would lose their hope in God, but others would repent, confess their sins, and look forward to their deliverance and the establishment of God's kingdom (cf. Dan. 9:3–19). Throughout this period, God would remain sovereign over the times and seasons, awaiting the due time to inaugurate a new action in history, reunite His people, and restore all things anew (see Amos 9:11–15).

During this time, those who engaged in the syncretistic cult at Dan and Bethel and who made pilgrimages to Beersheba would fall among the condemned (8:13–14; cf. 2:11; 4:10; 5:2; 1 Kin. 12:28–30; Hos. 8:6). Hosea compares the devastation of abandoned Israel to a parched land whose inhabitants die of thirst (Hos. 2:3; cf. Ezek.

19:12–13). Accordingly, the imagery of death by thirst in Amos 8:13 may serve as a metaphor to depict the tragic death of impenitent sinners.

9:1–15

ORACLES ON SURVIVAL AND RENEWAL

The book closes with a vivid description of judgment against the Northern Kingdom (9:1–6), followed by promises of renewal and hope (vv. 7–15). God never runs out of mercy and grace if only humans would listen to Him.

9:1–6. God's Word of Judgment. The last chapter of Amos begins by stressing the finality of God's judgment against Israel, a divine blow that He would personally inflict as Creator and Sovereign Lord over the cosmos. Amos depicts God as standing by the altar of the northern temple—not as a mediator to make atonement but as an enemy ready to annihilate the sanctuary and the religious/political culprits (v. 1; see also 7:7; Ex. 17:9). The Lord would end all contact with His people. From Sheol (“the tomb,” “the depths,” “hell”) to the heavens and from the top of Carmel to the bottom of the sea, there is nowhere to flee to escape from His judgment (Amos 9:2–3). Divine agency is thus linked to the idea of God's cosmic presence.

9:7–10. Judgment and Survival. God's impartiality is universal. Just as God had saved Israel and the nations (the Ethiopians, Philistines, and Aramaeans) each through its own exodus, so, too, would He hold each accountable for its crimes on the “Day of the LORD.” The Northern Kingdom would come to an end. In Amos, the term “Israel,” also called “Jacob” (3:13; 6:8; 7:2, 5; 8:7; 9:8), “Isaac” (7:9, 16), and “My people Israel,” denotes strictly the Northern Kingdom (cf. Hos. 11:12). Although Israel would suffer material and human loss and oppression, a historical remnant would survive both in exile and in the land and would undergo a sifting process of evaluation and selection (Amos 5:3; 9:8–9; cf. 8:11–12). God compared this process to a sieve that retains grain. Throughout the time of expectation for the eschatological restoration, He would remove the rubbish (i.e., the sinners) to perish but preserve the fine grain (i.e., the righteous who had recommitted to the Lord) to join the ranks of the end-time kingdom.

9:11–15. Restoration. God's final message to His people communicates a promise to save the people and give them righteous leaders (cf. Prov. 2:21–22). He would restore the palace, their property, their joy, and the abundant fertility of the land (cf. Lev. 26:5). The phrases “that day” and “the days are coming” represent not only a time of retribution but also an eschatological time of restoration. This is the only place in the OT that the tabernacle/shelter/booth of David occurs. It is unlikely that it designates a royal residence. It could mean the same as the “house of David” (that is, the Davidic dynasty; 2 Sam. 3:1, 8, 10; 1 Kin. 12:19–20; 2 Chr. 10:19), or it could refer to the kingdom, united under David but now fallen, that the Lord would restore under a messianic David. After the establishment of the kingdom, his heirs would gain authority over the righteous remnant of Edom and all the other nations. The nations that have God’s name would not only belong to Him but would also embrace the religious and ethical values necessary for a covenantal relationship with Him, including care, compassion, and justice (Amos 9:12; cf. Deut. 28:8–10; Prov. 21:3; Is. 63:19; Hos. 2:19; 12:7; Joel 2:32; Zech. 7:9).

Amos specifically includes Edom in this group of goyim (“nations,” “Gentiles”; cf. 1 Kin. 8:43). James and the early church understood this passage as evidence that Gentiles could receive full membership among God’s people without first having to become Jews (Acts 15:13–21). This remnant would constitute the remnant of Joseph, that is, the eschatological people of God.

The motif of the remnant is present in every chapter of the book (Amos 1:5, 15; 2:16; 3:12; 4:2–3, 6–11; 5:3, 13–17, 27; 6:7, 9–10; 7:8–9, 11, 17; 8:3, 8, 10–12; 9:8–15). The eschatological remnant would be both exclusive, because its members would be righteous, and inclusive, because its members would comprise all ethnicities. The righteous of Israel, Judah, Edom, and all the nations would inherit God’s end-time kingdom. The book of Amos, filled with prophecies of doom announcing the collapse of the Northern Kingdom, closes with a message of hope proclaiming the final victory of God’s mercy in a world of social injustice, moral corruption, and rebellious sin.

OBADIAH

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. Obadiah contains only twenty-one verses, making it the shortest book in the OT. The title of the book comes from the first line, khazon 'obadjah ("the vision of Obadiah"). The name Obadiah means "servant of the Lord," and some have suggested that it may be a generic way of referring to a prophet rather than the specific name of the author. However, Obadiah is a common name in the OT, referring to more than ten different individuals. Therefore it is most likely the actual name of the prophet, whose very name would constantly remind his listeners of the divine source of his message.

Date. Based on the content of the book and its near-parallel passage in Jeremiah 49:7–22, most interpreters place Obadiah in the first half of the sixth century, after the Babylonian army destroyed Jerusalem in 586 B.C. and before Babylon's war against Edom in 553 B.C. The vivid description of the fall of Jerusalem and the plight of its people at the hand of Edom may suggest a date shortly after the city's destruction, perhaps around 585–580 B.C. However, the ancient conflict between Israel and Edom allows for an earlier date (cf. Amos 1:11–12).

Backgrounds. Obadiah lived during one of the most traumatic periods in Israel's history, shortly after the fall of the Southern Kingdom of Judah. Centuries before, the nation had divided into two separate kingdoms, Israel in the north and Judah in the south. In 722 B.C. Assyria conquered the Northern Kingdom and exiled many of its citizens. Less than 150 years later, in 586 B.C., the Southern Kingdom of Judah met a similar fate. Babylon defeated Judah and burned Jerusalem, the capital city, and its magnificent temple to the ground (2 Kin. 25:9). The small neighboring nation of Edom, Judah's brother and longtime rival, helped sack Jerusalem and gloated over Judah's defeat. Obadiah wrote his book to bring renewed hope when all hope seemed lost.

Theology and Purpose. The theology of this short book emerges from its two central themes: the divine judgment of wicked nations and the establishment of God's kingdom.

1. Edom and the Nations. Obadiah focuses his message on Edom, a relatively unimportant nation on the world stage. Edom sided with Babylon in the war against Judah, identifying itself with those who destroy God's people (cf. Ps. 137:7–8). Obadiah decries conflict that respects no boundaries, demolishes family ties, and makes humans cruel and inhumane. This ungodly treatment of others occurs not only at a national level but also at a personal level. When humans inflict pain on others or refuse to help them, they violate a basic principle of Christianity (cf. Matt. 7:12). The phenomenon is universal, and Edom/Esau merely serves as a symbol of all who fight against the Lord and His people. They rejoice prematurely in their partial and temporary victory, unaware of the coming of a more powerful kingdom.

2. Edom's Punishment. As God works out His plan in the cosmic controversy, He humbles the proud and lifts up the humble. Pride is the root of all sin, the very essence of transgression (cf. Is. 14:12–20; Ezek. 28:11–19). It eliminates any sense of need that humans have and produces feelings of superiority, ruining their life-giving relationship with their Creator and ultimately making them insensitive and cruel toward others. Humility, on the other hand, recognizes the need for a life-giving relationship with God and results in care and concern for others. God condemned Edom's pride and how they rejoiced over the captivity of God's people (Obad. 11–12). It would lead to the undoing of the whole nation. The Day of the Lord against the nations was yet to come (v. 15).

3. Jerusalem and Judah's Restoration. God promised restoration not merely to replace one earthly nation with another but to restore the kingdom of God in the world. In a preliminary restoration, God would return His people to their home as He promised their forefathers. At that time the land would become safe, it would support life, and peace would ensue. The Savior, representing the presence of God Himself among His people, would accomplish this (v. 21). Thus, Obadiah's prophecy anticipates and symbolizes the final restoration of the earth itself, when God would establish His kingdom in the world (cf. Rev. 21). It moves from the regional (Edom) to the universal, culminating in the return of God's people, the rule of the saviors/deliverers (Heb. moshi'im from moshia') from Mount Zion, and the restoration of the Lord's kingdom (Obad. 19–21).

Literary Features. Obadiah wrote his prophecy in poetic form. It displays a certain rhythm and cadence when read in its original language. Hebrew poetry frequently repeats thoughts for heightened effect, a feature known as parallelism. For example, in v. 8 Edom and “the mountains of Esau” (lit. “Mount Esau”) refer to the same place. Hebrew also uses repetition for emphasis or dramatic effect. For example, vv. 12–14 contain the word 'al (“not”) eight times for emphasis. This builds up in a crescendo of persuasion (a similar technique is used in Prov. 30:18–31; Amos 1–2).

Additionally, familiar expressions serve as formulas to help explain what follows. For example, in the ancient world servants proclaiming an edict or proclamation of the reigning king would use a messenger formula similar to Obadiah 1. Obadiah and other prophets used this formula to indicate that their message came from the one true King, the Sovereign Lord. Moreover, they used standard expressions to indicate an important subject. For example, “the day of the LORD” (v. 15) generally introduces prophetic announcements regarding final events. Such literary devices are telltale clues to what follows.

COMMENTARY

1–4

Introduction and Message of Doom

The book of Obadiah recounts a vision (kha-zon). Of the two terms used to describe a prophetic vision, ro'eh and khozeh, the former generally refers to the visionary experience of the prophet, while the latter typically focuses on the content of a special revelation given to the prophet in vision. Obadiah, the messenger, attributes his message to God. He is not venting personal hostility toward Edom but announcing what divine revelation showed him.

The originator of the message, the Lord God, is identified by His personal name, yahweh (translated as “LORD”), as well as the title 'adonai (“Lord”), indicating that God is Lord of the whole world. Some understand the recipient of the message to be Edom, but in this case le-edom (lit. “to Edom”) probably means “concerning Edom” or “about Edom.” The plural “we have heard” confirms that the recipients were the surrounding nations, including the people of Judah, called to listen to God's message. The report/message concerned all the nations in the region and the role Edom played among them. They would humiliate Edom, thereby ending its arrogance and pride. The Hebrew verb qum (“rise”), repeated for emphasis, expresses God's command to the nations to mobilize for a battle against Edom.

The reversal of fortunes from arrogance to humility is a familiar theme in the prophetic books (cf. Is. 14:12–23; Ezek. 28:1–19). God brings the proud low, regardless of the heights to which they have ascended (Obad. 2–3). Those who lived in the rock clefts were Edomites who inhabited the caves and crags of the massive mountains found in Edom (v. 3). The word sela (“rock”) may specifically refer to the Edomite site by the same name, which Judah had captured much earlier (2 Kin. 14:7), or it could represent the entire territory of Edom.

The first part of Obadiah's vision concludes by comparing Edom to a soaring eagle (Obad. 4). Here the eagle represents national strength (cf. Ezek. 17:1–21) not only because of its plumage and the power of its talons but also because it builds its nest on the highest pinnacles. However, the Lord declares His intention to bring the eagle down from its lofty position. This illustrates one of the central, universal messages of the book: God will humble the proud.

5–7

Complete Destruction

Given Edom's pride and sense of security, their fall would seem stunning and almost inexplicable. But the higher the eagle soars, the further it will fall (v. 4). Obadiah prophesies Edom's total destruction using two familiar images: thieves coming to steal in the night and grape gatherers working during the day (v. 5). Edom would not be safe during either the night or the day.

God had instructed harvesters to leave some of the crop for the poor to glean (v. 5; cf. Lev. 19:9-10; Ruth 2:2-3, 7). But the destruction of Edom would leave nothing in the houses or the fields.

In commenting upon this remarkable punishment, Obadiah refers to the story of Edom's ancestor, Esau, Jacob's brother (Obad. 7; Gen. 27). Deception followed deception in the life of Jacob and his family. In the end he felt obliged to return large gifts from his flocks to appease his angry brother (Gen. 32:1-21). Obadiah hints at these stories in his prediction that Esau/Edom's former confederates (lit. "all the men of your covenant") would remove all their possessions and drive the people of Edom to its national borders (Obad. 7). The friends in whom Edom once trusted would now become enemies. Pride breeds deception, and deception leads to destruction. Eventually that fate overtakes the proud everywhere.

8-14

Edom's Offense: The Heart of the Matter

The expression ne'um yahweh (lit. "the declaration of the Lord"), frequently used throughout the prophets, introduces the third part of Obadiah's message, underscoring the divine authority behind the message. The passage describes the impending punishment (vv. 8, 9), the charge against Edom (vv. 10, 11), and the violations against Jacob, Edom's brother (vv. 12-14).

8-9. The Punishment. "That day" in v. 8 might refer to the "day of the LORD," when the Lord would restore Zion to its former glory (v. 15). However, here it more likely refers to the immediately preceding description of the punishment of Edom, a catastrophe caused by the absence of understanding in a land traditionally known for its wisdom (v. 8; Job 4:1; Jer. 49:7). God would destroy the wise in Edom and understanding on Mount Esau (Obad. 8; cf. 1 Cor. 1:18-30). The latter is not otherwise identified and could refer to Mount Seir or Mount Teman. However, the parallel construction shows that it refers to the entire country. The lack of Esau's understanding alludes to his foolish decision to sell his birthright for food (Gen. 25:29-34). Without understanding, they would lose the battle. First the warriors and then everyone in the city (Teman) and throughout the country would be cut down. In the OT, a lack of understanding, rather than a lack of power, frequently leads to personal or national defeat (cf. 2 Sam. 16:23; 17:14).

10-11. The Charge Against Edom. God clearly spells out the reason for punishing Edom: they had committed violence against a brother (Jacob) that reached unimaginable proportions (vv. 10-11). That is not how brothers should relate to each other. Specifically, Edom stood by or even assisted the Babylonians when they attacked Jerusalem. By taking the side of the enemy, Edom became like one of the Babylonians, a foreigner who acceded to Judah and Jerusalem's defeat. Edom helped decide Jerusalem's fate, treating it like an object to "cast lots" (i.e., gamble) over (v. 11). They had broken the bond of brotherhood.

Therefore, what Edom did to Judah would now happen to them. They would be covered with shame (v. 10). Those without clothing normally suffered shame (Gen. 3:7, 10, 21), so conquerors customarily stripped their defeated enemies naked for all to gloat over (Obad. 12). As punishment for crimes against a brother, Edom would be stripped bare.

12-14. Principles Violated. As though sensing questions about the severity of this punishment, God lays out eight prohibitions that Edom violated. The Hebrew negative 'al ("not") indicates a strong, categorical prohibition. Here God directs these prohibitions specifically at Edom's offenses at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem. The total number of eight highlights the seriousness of Edom's unbrotherly conduct: (1) They gazed on/gloated over their brother's captivity. (2) They rejoiced over the destruction of Judah. (3) They spoke proudly at the time of Judah's distress. (Boasting, always wrong, is particularly hateful when it occurs at a family member's expense.) (4) They entered Jerusalem's gates on the day of disaster. (By doing so, Edom joined the Babylonians.) (5) They gazed on/gloated over Judah's suffering, finding pleasure in harm done to others. (6) They laid hands on Judah's possessions, stealing from the defenseless on the day of their greatest need. (7) They cut off/destroyed those who escaped. (8) They delivered up/handed over the remnant of survivors, taking the escaping fugitives captive or, worse yet, selling them into slavery.

In his vision, Obadiah experienced the disastrous event of Jerusalem's destruction as though it were current, reliving its pain, and so described the prohibitions as they would have applied at the time of the offense. The family is a sacred unit, making hatred toward brothers or sisters particularly offensive. When love turns to hate, it respects no bounds.

Reversal of Fortunes

This section begins with the prophet announcing the approaching Day of the Lord for all nations (v. 15). He transitions from the previous judgment gradually, as though unable to leave behind the horrors of the eight prohibitions without a backward glance. The prophet announces judgment on the nations (vv. 15-16) and the deliverance of Zion (vv. 17-18).

15-16. Judgment on the Nations: The Day of the Lord. The Prophet Amos had first prophesied about the Day of the Lord nearly two hundred years before Obadiah (Amos 5:18-20; cf. Is. 13:6-13), so the expression was familiar to at least some of the covenant people. It refers to the day (time) of the end, when God will enter history to determine its outcome, saving His people and punishing the enemy. Unlike “that day” for Edom (Obad. 8), the Day of the Lord would be universal—the day when the Lord Himself would judge all nations and restore the whole world. This phrase connects the local conflict between Judah and Edom with the worldwide conflict between good and evil and with God’s judgment upon all nations (v. 16). Obadiah compares this judgment to drinking God’s cup of wrath. As Edom had drunk to celebrate victory on God’s holy mountain (Zion; v. 16), so all the nations, including Edom, would continually drink the cup of defeat/wrath. For those opposed to the Lord, this cup would contain a curse (cf. Rev. 14:10) leading to drunkenness and judgment that would render them as though they had never existed (Obad. 16). However, for followers of God, drinking from the cup He provides results in blessing (cf. Ps. 23:5). The consequence of drinking from God’s cup depends on whether one drinks with a heart of confession and commitment or a heart of unbelief and denial (cf. 1 Cor. 11:27-29).

17-18. Deliverance from Zion. On that day only Mount Zion would be secure, but it would make the whole world a safe and holy place (on the centrality of Zion on the Day of the Lord, see Is. 2; Ezek. 40-48; Mic. 4). From there God would teach all nations His law, and they would beat their weapons into farming tools (Is. 2:1-5; Mic. 4:1-5). Zion would be God’s holy mountain—a house of worship for all (cf. Is. 56:7).

The house of Jacob refers to the family of the patriarch, the twelve tribes, and thus to the whole nation of Israel (Obad. 18). The house of Joseph would again constitute part of the house of Jacob, as when Jacob blessed his descendants (cf. Gen. 48:5). The northern and southern tribes would reunite and, like a fire, burn everything in their path, including Edom. In a reversal of fortunes, Edom would end and the land and people of Israel would be restored. This foreshadows the outcome of the final conflict between good and evil. God would banish wickedness forever and exalt His people. This section concludes with the assurance that the Lord has spoken (Obad. 18b).

19-21

Restoration of Land and People

The ultimate goal of God’s judgment was not the destruction of Edom but the restoration of Judah and all Israel. The people of Israel would retake possession of areas that had fallen into the hands of others since the period of the united monarchy. The people of the Negev, the southern desert between the Arabah Valley and the Sinai Desert, would occupy the southernmost part of Transjordan (the land east of the Jordan River), including Edom (v. 19). To the west, the inhabitants of the Shephelah, the lowlands/hill country between the Judean mountains and the coastal plain, would inhabit the land of the Philistines (v. 19), including Ephraim and Samaria, areas once controlled by Philistine outposts. Benjamin, just north of Jerusalem, would possess the northern part of Transjordan, known as Gilead. Israelite exiles would return to the Holy Land and possess the northwest as far as Zarephath by Sidon (v. 20). Finally, captives from Jerusalem in faraway Sepharad, perhaps in the distant north, would return to the south. This redistribution of the promised land to displaced Israelites would once again unite land and people within Israel’s original borders.

In the center of it all, saviors/deliverers would rule from Mount Zion over Edom and all the territory Israel held during the golden age of David and Solomon, from Dan to Beersheba and from the eastern desert to the western sea. This vision of Israel’s future was never realized, even when Judah returned from exile and restored Jerusalem a few decades after Obadiah. Sadly, the restored Judah was just as disobedient as before. However, the vision anticipates a future end-time kingdom as promised to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The destruction of Edom would merely pave the way for the restoration of the righteous in a kingdom belonging to the Lord (v. 21). This promise has become the advent hope of those who wait for the Messiah to return. The resolution of the conflict between Edom and Judah represents a future when God's eternal kingdom, populated by God's faithful children throughout the ages, will replace all the nations of this world.

JONAH

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. In Hebrew this book is titled yonah, the name of the Prophet Jonah, which means “dove.” Jonah was the son of Amittai from Gath Hepher in the territory of the tribe of Zebulun (Jon. 1:1; 2 Kin. 14:25). Unlike many other prophetic books, the book of Jonah does not specify its author. Though it tells Jonah’s story, another person could have written it using material from the prophet himself. This would explain why the narrative is written in the third person.

Date. Jonah prophesied in the first half of the eighth century B.C., during the reign of King Jeroboam II of Israel (793–753 B.C.; 2 Kin. 14:23–27). Sometime during this period, God sent the prophet to Assyria, the major foreign power at the time, to prophesy in the city of Nineveh. The author states that Nineveh “was” a large city (Jon. 3:3). Some suggest that the use of “was” implies that, by the time the book was written, Nineveh was no longer large. This would point to a time after the fall of the city in 612 B.C. However, the likelihood that the book was written in the Northern Kingdom would point to a date before Israel and Samaria fell to Assyria in 722 B.C.

Backgrounds. During the reign of Jeroboam II, Israel experienced a period of territorial expansion and economic growth, developments that Jonah interpreted as God’s will (2 Kin. 14:25). However, other prophets during this period of prosperity denounced the injustices and rampant materialism that arose (see Amos 2:6–8; 4:1–3). Against this background, the book of Jonah reveals a prophet willing to announce God’s blessing on Israel but not His positive involvement with the nations.

No independent historical evidence exists for Jonah’s ministry in Nineveh. However, some have plausibly suggested that events in Assyria during this period might reflect his ministry or provide a context for its acceptance. For example, Adad-Nirari III (ca. 810–783 B.C.) introduced religious reforms that shifted away from traditional polytheism. Also, several plagues and a solar eclipse occurred during the reign of Ashur-Dan (ca. 772–755 B.C.). These might have predisposed the Ninevites to accept Jonah’s message. The title “king of Nineveh” in Jonah 3:6 may suggest a local ruler rather than an emperor since Nineveh did not become the capital of Assyria until the time of Sennacherib (705–682 B.C.). So the emperor did not live there at that time.

Theology and Purpose. The book of Jonah presents a more complex theology than its length or apparent simplicity might suggest. It covers three main areas: the sovereignty of God, God’s people and the people of the world, and the compassion of God.

1. The Sovereignty of God. Jonah sums up the extent of God’s sovereignty when he states that he fears/worships “the LORD, the God of heaven, who made the sea and the dry land” (1:9). As Creator, God has dominion over creation. He sent a great wind on the sea (1:4), prepared (Heb. manah) a great fish to swallow Jonah (1:17), commanded the fish to deposit Jonah on dry ground (2:10), prepared (manah) a plant to shade Jonah’s head (4:6), prepared (manah) a worm to destroy the plant (4:7), and then prepared (manah) an east wind to beat on Jonah’s head (4:8). Significantly, in each case creation immediately obeyed. God also showed His sovereignty in His role as Judge. He told Jonah to denounce Nineveh, a city He had judged to be wicked (1:2). When God renewed this commission, Jonah proclaimed a message of destruction against the city (3:4). Yet the sovereign Judge also saved Nineveh from destruction (3:10), just as He used the fish to save Jonah from drowning (1:17; 2:10). In the absence of hope, God creates hope for all.

2. God's People and the People of the World.

The heart of the book's radical message concerns how God relates to His chosen people on the one hand and to the nations on the other. The author communicates this message through a series of striking comparisons and contrasts. In chapter 1, while the pagan sailors prayed, Jonah, the Israelite prophet, slept (1:5). Using the same Hebrew verbs which God used to call Jonah at the outset—qum and qara' (1:6; cf. v. 2)—the ship's captain roused Jonah from his slumber and told him to pray to his God. The captain understood that when life is threatened and hope seems to fade away, prayer provides the most important refuge. In this respect, the pagan mariners appear more spiritually aware than Jonah. Moreover, God answered the prayers of both the Gentiles (1:14–15) and the Israelite (2:2), saving both from the storm. Jonah's rejection of God's word in chapter 1 contrasts with the positive response of Nineveh to God's word in chapter 3. In both chapters, the ship's Gentile captain (chap. 1) and the Gentile king of Nineveh (chap. 3) humbly submitted to the will of God. They did not try to dictate His actions (1:6; 3:9). By contrast, the salvation of Nineveh angered Jonah, who refused to accept God's will (4:1–3). These and other comparisons and contrasts challenge Jonah's view that only God's chosen people should receive His compassion and grace.

3. The Compassion of God. Jonah summed up the depth of God's compassion, affirming His attributes of grace, mercy, slowness to anger, abundant kindness, and long-suffering patience before bringing judgment (4:2b). The prophet quoted Exodus 34:6–7 in confessing that he had disobeyed because of God's well-known compassion (Jon. 4:2a). The plot of the whole book revolves around the consequences of Jonah's rejection of God's compassion for others. Jonah did not want to extend the hope of life to the nations. Yet Jonah himself received God's compassion. God prepared a fish to rescue him from certain death and implicitly forgave his initial rejection of God's call by renewing it the second time (3:1). His experience parallels Nineveh's. Despite their moral offenses, the Ninevites experienced God's compassion when He responded to their repentance by explicitly forgiving them (3:10). God heard the sincere cry of sinners and relented (3:9–10). Indeed, the abounding compassion of God, an expression of His loving-kindness (Heb. khesed), continues to give hope to sinful human beings who repent and run to Him.

Literary Features. Jonah is one of the most accomplished literary works in the Bible. It is meticulously structured, with each part of the book preparing for or echoing another. This is most obvious when comparing chapter 1 with chapter 3 and chapter 2 with chapter 4. However, important interconnections extend beyond those pairings. The use of chiasms (see 1:4–16) achieves an accomplished balance and symmetry. Subtle repetitions of key terms (e.g., “arise” and “call”/“cry out”) underline important themes. The use of wordplays and words with more than one connotation (e.g., “overthrow”) keep the reader alert to deeper meaning in the text. The author artfully crafts allusions to other passages of Scripture into the narrative, suggesting numerous comparisons and contrasts to guide interpretation. Finally, the large number of questions (see 1:10; 3:9; 4:11) shows that the book is less concerned with telling readers what to do or believe and more with asking them how they might respond to its challenging message.

Nineveh

Nineveh was a large city in Assyria, an empire with a legendary reputation for ruthlessness and barbarity. The prophets frequently prophesied about God's future judgment on Nineveh/Assyria. The entire book of Nahum addresses the issue (see also Mic. 5:6; Zeph. 2:13). Situated on the Tigris River, Nineveh exerted a strong political influence for several centuries. In Jonah's time it had not yet reached its golden age as the Assyrian capital under Sennacherib (705–682 B.C.). Nevertheless, it had already achieved considerable power. The Assyrians conquered the Northern Kingdom of Israel in 722 B.C., and Nineveh itself fell to a Babylonian and Median coalition in 612 B.C.

COMMENTARY

1:1–16

God's Word and Jonah's Response

God told Jonah to go to Nineveh, but he disobeyed and fled by ship (1:1–3). A great storm threatened to wreck the ship, and the terrified pagan sailors discovered that God had sent it to punish Jonah (vv. 4–7). Jonah confessed his faith in the Lord and requested that the sailors throw him overboard (vv. 8–15a). The sea immediately calmed down and the sailors worshiped the Lord (vv. 15b–16).

1:1–3. Jonah's Call. Jonah ministered to two evil rulers, Jeroboam II of Israel and the king of Nineveh. He was apparently willing to prophesy success for Israel (2 Kin. 14:25); but for Nineveh, only judgment. Such contrasting attitudes to Israel and the nations appear throughout the book.

Like many other prophets, Jonah is introduced by a declaration that “the word of the LORD came to” him (see also Hos. 1:1; Joel 1:1; Mic. 1:1). The same phrase introduces Elijah (1 Kin. 17:2–3, 8–9), the first of several parallels between the ministries of the two prophets. In 1 Kings 17:9, God’s command to Elijah begins with the same words as His command to Jonah (Heb. qum lekḥ, “arise and go, go at once”).

Despite this conventional introduction, Jonah’s response contrasts not only with Elijah’s but also with all other prophets. He refused to go to Nineveh to denounce its wickedness. Instead, he fled to Tarshish. Some identify Tarshish with Tartessos, on the Baetis River in modern-day Spain. If correct, then Jonah tried to flee as far west from Nineveh as possible. However, Tarshish may more likely be Tarsus in Cilicia, home of the Apostle Paul. Several texts seem to place Tarshish close to Greece (see Gen. 10:2–4; Ezek. 27:12–14). Wherever it was, Tarshish was outside of Israel and nowhere near Nineveh. Jonah intended to go there to flee from the Lord (Jon. 1:3). The only other character in the OT to do something similar was Cain, who went to the land of Nod after murdering his brother (Gen. 4:16). That connection suggests the seriousness of Jonah’s disobedience. Significantly, however, the text does not immediately say why Jonah disobeyed. The author wants to reveal a little more about him first.

1:4–16. Jonah's Flight. Jonah 1:4–16 forms a chiasm:

- A Beginning of the Storm: Worshiping Other Gods (vv. 4–5a)
- B Goods Thrown into the Sea (v. 5b)
- C The Captain’s Hope for Deliverance (vv. 5c–6)
- D The Culprit Discussed (v. 7a)
- E Jonah Identified as the Cause (v. 7b)
- F Jonah Interrogated (v. 8)
- G God, the Creator of All Things (v. 9)

F’ Jonah Interrogated (v. 10a)

E’ Jonah Identified as the Cause (v. 10b)

D’ Punishment Discussed (v. 11)

C’ The Means of Deliverance Revealed (vv. 12–13)

B’ Jonah Thrown into the Sea (vv. 14–15)

A’ End of the Storm: Worshiping the Lord (vv. 15b–16)

The structure begins and ends with pagan sailors worshiping and hinges in the center on Jonah’s confession of faith in God as the Creator of all things. This highlights the main feature of this section: the contrast between pagans and God’s prophet.

The series of contrasts begins with mariners worshiping their gods while the prophet, who was running away from his God, slept (v. 5). In a striking role reversal, the ship’s captain had to wake Jonah up and tell him to call on God (v. 6). Normally, the prophet should call on others to seek God. Just as strikingly, the captain’s words repeat God’s commands to Jonah (cf. v. 2). The word of the Lord came to Jonah (v. 1), but a pagan sailor, not the Israelite prophet, spoke it. Jonah finally confessed his faith but only when the sailors discovered his guilt and forced him to answer their penetrating questions (v. 7–9). His confession of God as the Creator of all things rings very hollow considering he had boarded the ship to flee from Him (v. 3). However, it forms the basis of the rest of the book, which serves as a commentary on its implications.

The sailors then prayed to the Lord, worshiped Him, offered a sacrifice, and made vows (vv. 14, 16). This contrasts with the beginning of the section, when they worshiped their individual gods. Despite Jonah’s behavior, they had come to believe in the power of his God. But Jonah did not pray, sacrifice, or make vows to the God of Israel. He mentioned God’s name only when directly asked about the cause of the storm. The pagan sailors behaved more admirably than the prophet called by God. This disturbing assessment paves the way for even more radical revelations later in the book.

The ship’s captain roused Jonah from his sleep because he hoped that Jonah’s God might have concern for them and prevent them from perishing in the storm (v. 6). The captain wanted to save all life on board his ship but knew he could not demand it. This is the first of several expressions of hope found throughout the book (see 2:1–2; 3:9). The full significance of Jonah's willingness to be thrown overboard, essentially a death wish, does not become clear until his second expression of the same desire (1:12; 4:3, 9).

1:17–2:10

God's Salvation and Jonah's Praise

God prepared a fish to swallow Jonah (1:17). From the belly of the fish, Jonah praised God for saving him from drowning (2:1–7), denounced idol worship (2:8), and vowed to offer sacrifices to the Lord (2:9). At God's command, the fish vomited Jonah onto dry land (2:10).

1:17. Jonah Swallowed by the Fish. The book of Jonah stresses God's sovereignty, a theme that recurs several times in chapter 1. In His sovereignty, God sent Jonah to cry out against Nineveh (v. 1), sent a great wind on the sea in response to Jonah's flight to Tarshish (v. 4), and later calmed the storm (v. 15). He also prepared a large fish to swallow Jonah to rescue the prophet from drowning to death. Jonah was in the great fish for "three days and three nights" (v. 7). His experience foreshadows "the three days and three nights" Christ would spend "in the heart of the earth" (Matt. 12:40).

2:1–10. Jonah's Psalm and God's Response.

Jonah offered a type of psalm known as a thanksgiving, used in Israel to thank God for specific acts of His grace, especially for saving the worshiper(s) from death or persecution. The fact that he uttered the thanksgiving from within the fish shows that Jonah recognized it as God's means of saving him from drowning. Understanding the role of the fish is essential to understanding the dynamics of the book as a whole. Significantly, the psalm is not a lament (such as Pss. 22, 44), in which psalmists typically complained to God when they faced death or experienced persecution. A lament would mean Jonah viewed the fish as punishment rather than salvation.

Jonah used conventional language commonly found in many other psalms to describe his cry from the depths of she'ol ("grave," "death," or "pit"; Jon. 2:2; cf. Ps. 86:13), God's answer (Jon. 2:2; cf. Ps. 120:1), the feeling of turbulent waves sweeping over him (Jon. 2:3; cf. Ps. 42:7), and his removal from the Lord's sight (Jon. 2:4; cf. Ps. 31:22). Numerous other similarities to various psalms also occur throughout Jonah. These similarities indicate that he knew how to worship in an appropriate manner, just as his words to the sailors show he knew his theology well (Jon. 1:9). He was an orthodox Israelite. Yet he declared his faith in God, called on God to rescue him, and offered Him praise all while fleeing from Him. Jonah had an orthodox faith but struggled to live out its obvious implications. The introduction of this theme here leads to the climax at the end.

Jonah's psalm begins with a description of his thoughts and experience as he descended through the deep waters. The psychological distress/affliction caused by the real threat of death moved him to seek help from the Lord. He affirms that the Lord had answered his prayer, probably in the sense that God sent him the great fish to preserve him alive (2:2). He again describes his fearful experience, but this time he expresses his real fear that he had been permanently expelled from the presence of God (vv. 3–4). Nevertheless, Jonah looked toward the heavenly temple and prayed to the Lord. Another description of his deadly experience follows (vv. 5–6b), closing with the affirmation that God rescued him from the grave by sending the fish (v. 6c). The Lord had heard Jonah's prayer and answered it from His holy temple (v. 7). Jonah concludes the psalm by renewing his commitment to the Lord, affirming God's superiority over idols, and making a vow of thanksgiving to the Lord for saving him (vv. 7–9). The psalm demonstrates his orthodox faith, such as his belief in the efficacy of prayer and the heavenly sanctuary (v. 7; cf. Ps. 20:7).

Jonah's experience parallels that of the sailors. They faced a threat to their lives and called on the Lord (Jon. 1:14). He heard them and delivered them (1:15). Jonah also came face to face with death and called on the Lord, and God heard his voice and delivered him (2:2).

The Sign of Jonah

In Matthew 12:39, Christ responded to a request for a sign by saying that the only sign his generation would get was "the sign of the prophet Jonah" (cf. Matt. 16:4; Luke 11:29). He explained that just as Jonah was in the fish for three days and three nights, so He would be in the earth. He, like Jonah, would face death but be rescued from it after three days. But the parallel is only partial, for Christ is "greater than Jonah" (Matt. 12:41; Luke 11:32). Nonetheless, Jonah prefigures His death and resurrection (see commentary on Hos. 6:1–3).

God answered the prayers of Gentiles and Israelite alike. Unknown to Jonah down in the belly of the fish, these same mariners on board the ship also offered a sacrifice to the Lord and took vows (1:16). The prophet and the sailors reacted in identical ways because they had all seen the power and authority of Jonah's God. The rest of the book reveals how this saved Israelite would react to more Gentiles in need of salvation.

This entire section began with the fish swallowing Jonah (1:17) and ended with the fish vomiting him out. The fish's obedience to God contrasts with Jonah's disobedience and brings the first half of the book to an appropriate conclusion.

3:1–10

God's Word and Nineveh's Response

Jonah obeyed God's renewed call to go to Nineveh (3:1–3). He prophesied the city's imminent destruction. The population repented because the king hoped that their repentance would avert punishment (vv. 4–9). God accepted their repentance and did not destroy the city (v. 10).

3:1–4. Jonah Preaches God's Word. Verses 1–3 echo the language of Jonah's first call in chapter 1. For a second time the word of the Lord came to Jonah, telling him to go to Nineveh and proclaim God's message to the people. This time, however, rather than fleeing to Tarshish, he obeyed God and went to Nineveh. The contrast between Jonah's two responses to the word of God shows how his salvation from death had profoundly affected him. He had already praised God for His grace, promising to serve Him (2:9), and now he obeyed Him.

Jonah proclaimed that Nineveh would be overthrown in forty days (3:4). The same Hebrew verb, hapak ("overthrow"), describes the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, when God "overthrew the cities" (Gen. 19:29). Nineveh's destruction also seemed certain because Jonah did not invite the people to repent. It took three days to save Jonah (Jon. 1:17); it also took him three days to preach judgment (3:3). However, Nineveh was given forty days to await its destruction. Yet the city responded immediately—on the first day (vv. 4–5). Nineveh's immediate repentance contrasts with Jonah's delayed obedience.

Although Jonah ministered in the first half of the eighth century B.C. (2 Kin. 14:25), the fate of Nineveh can be compared to the later fate of two other cities. The capitals of Israel (Samaria) and Judah (Jerusalem) were destroyed as divine punishment for their sins in 722 B.C. and 586 B.C., respectively (2 Kin. 18:9–12; 25:1–10). If God did not spare His own people, surely He would not spare Nineveh, a center of pagan injustice and cruelty. The rest of Jonah gives a surprising response to this assumption.

3:5–10. Nineveh Repents and God Relents. Nineveh's startling reaction to Jonah's preaching strongly contrasts with others in the Prophets, particularly Jerusalem's reaction to Jeremiah. In Jeremiah 36, Jeremiah threatened Jerusalem with God's judgment so they might repent of their sins. Repentance would lead to God's forgiveness (Jer. 36:3), just like it did in Nineveh. However, King Jehoiakim of Judah rejected Jeremiah's preaching, so God responded by bringing about all the threatened disasters (Jer. 36:31). In contrast, the king of Nineveh commanded his people to call urgently on God (Jon. 3:8). Consequently, God relented from the threatened disaster and did not destroy Nineveh (v. 10).

Jonah 3:4 subtly conveys the possibility of Nineveh repenting. Jonah's announcement that Nineveh would be "overthrown" (hapak) seems to offer no hope of salvation. If he had used the verb "perish" ('abad), used by the captain (1:6), the sailors (1:14), the king (3:9), and finally the Lord (4:10), then this would definitely be the case. However, the verb hapak has two distinct meanings. It can mean "overturn," in the sense of "destroy" (Gen. 19:29), or it can mean "turn around." For example, in Jeremiah 31:13 God promises that He will turn [hapak] mourning into joy/gladness. In fact, all occurrences of hapak in the Niphal verbal stem, the form used here, mean "turn around" rather than "destroy." Before Nineveh repented, Jonah's words seemed to mean that the city would be overturned, but instead it was turned around. So, Jonah's words were in fact fulfilled, just not in the way Jonah expected. The repentance of Nineveh decided between the two possibilities.

While Nineveh's response to God contrasts with Jerusalem's later response, it resembles the reaction of the pagan sailors in chapter 1. The sailors "feared the LORD" and "offered a sacrifice" (Jon. 1:16), while the Ninevites believed God and proclaimed a fast (3:5). The ship's captain and the king of Nineveh also behaved in similar ways. The captain (unconsciously) repeated God's own words (1:6; cf. 1:2) like a prophet delivering "the word of the LORD." The king's call for Nineveh to repent and reform resembles the prophets' frequent call for Israel to repent (3:8; cf. Joel 2:12–14). The king’s choice of words when he admonished the people to turn from/give up their evil ways in Jonah 3:8 also occurs in God’s instructions to the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. 36:3, 7; cf. 26:3), a passage already shown to be closely related to Jonah 3. The king’s behavior also contrasts with Jonah’s. In chapter 1 the word (dabar) of the Lord came to Jonah, commanding him to leave immediately (Heb. qum lekh, lit. “arise and go”), but instead he immediately rose and fled from the presence of the Lord (1:2–3). In 3:6, when the king heard the message/word (Heb. dabar) from God, he immediately rose (Heb. qum) from his throne and told the city to repent, reform, and call out urgently to God (v. 8). Nineveh was more responsive than Jerusalem, and the sailors and the king of Nineveh were more responsive than Jonah.

This chapter climaxes with God’s response to Nineveh’s repentance. The people of Nineveh turned (shub) from their evil (ra’) ways, and God relented (nakham) from the disaster (ra’ah, lit. “evil”; v. 10). The people changed their behavior, so God changed His intention. The king received precisely what he hoped for when he wondered whether God would yet turn (shub) and relent (nakham; v. 9). His hope echoes the ship captain’s hope for divine deliverance (1:6). For a pagan, the king showed remarkable spiritual insight, for God often changes His intention (nakham) in a demonstration of His grace (see Jer. 18:8; 26:3; cf. 2 Sam. 24:16). In Exodus 32:14, a verse virtually identical with Jonah 3:10, the Lord relented (nakham) from the disaster (ra’ah, lit. “evil”) which He said He would bring on His people, Israel. What God did for Israel in the past, He now did for Nineveh. In the OT God frequently relents from sending punishment on Israel. But the book of Jonah makes clear that God’s mercy extends beyond His own covenant people.

The experiences of Jonah and of Nineveh parallel each other. At the beginning of the book, Jonah deserved God’s judgment because he disobeyed and fled from His presence. He faced death when he was thrown overboard into a raging sea. But God, in His grace, saved him by sending the fish to swallow him. Like Jonah, Nineveh too deserved God’s judgment because of its wickedness. It too faced death when Jonah prophesied its overthrow in forty days. And God, in His grace, also saved them when He “relented” from sending the punishment. God offers salvation by grace through faith to all, whether Jew or Gentile (Eph. 2:8).

4:1–11

God’s Salvation and Jonah’s Protest

The final chapter is structured in three parts. Each concludes with God asking Jonah a question (4:4, 9, 11). Jonah answered only the second question. The first two challenged Jonah’s right to be angry. The third defends the Lord’s pity for Nineveh—the main reason for Jonah’s anger.

4:1–4. Jonah’s Anger and God’s First Question. When God saved him, Jonah was extremely thankful (2:1–9). But when God saved Nineveh, Jonah was extremely angry (4:1). In a book full of contrasts, this is the most telling of all. The repetition of the Hebrew word ra’ah to describe Jonah’s anger recalls both Nineveh’s repentance and God’s relenting in order to underline that Jonah was angry about both of these.

- The king of Nineveh told the people to turn from their evil (ra’) ways (3:8).
- They turned from their evil (ra’) ways (3:10).
- God relented from the disaster (ra’ah) (3:10).
- But it displeased Jonah exceedingly (ra’a’ ... ra’ah) (4:1).

Jonah responded to Nineveh’s repentance and God’s relenting with great displeasure and anger. Verse 4:1 literally reads, “it was evil to Jonah—a great evil—and he became angry.” His anger prompted him to offer his second prayer in the book, which produces yet another contrast. In his first prayer, Jonah prayed that he might live (2:2, 6). In the second, he prayed that he might die (4:3). What could possibly explain this huge contrast between life-affirming thankfulness for his own salvation and death-seeking anger for Nineveh’s salvation?

Jonah’s problem was not caused by a lack of biblical knowledge or theological understanding but by an inability to accept the implications of his belief. He finally confessed why he fled to Tarshish at the outset. He disobeyed because he understood the character of God. He quoted Exodus 34:6–7, which enumerates God’s loving, gracious, and patient characteristics, including His willingness to relent from His threatened punishments (Jon. 4:2b). God did precisely what Jonah had surmised He would do (v. 2): He relented (nakham) from the disaster (3:10). Elsewhere, the people of Israel cited Exodus 34:6–7 to praise God (see Num. 14:18; Neh. 9:17; Pss. 86:15; 103:8; 145:8; Joel 2:13), but Jonah cited it in order to condemn Him. The grace which God offered to Israel, He now offered to foreigners. Jonah had enough theological knowledge to predict that but not enough compassion to accept it. That is why he was extremely angry (see PK 271).

Jonah's confession sheds light on why he told the sailors to throw him into the sea (Jon. 1:12), which should have meant certain death. He had a death wish when running away from Nineveh, and he had one after going there. Whether fleeing or going, disobeying God's word or obeying it, he would rather die than see Nineveh saved. Jonah refused to embrace the lesson the Lord was trying to teach him.

This section ends with the first of three questions God asked Jonah in this chapter. "Is it right for you to be angry?" (4:4). The answer is surely "no!" But Jonah's answer is delayed to the end of the next section, maximizing its effect.

4:5–9. Jonah's Anger and God's Second Question. Arresting contrasts are common in Jonah, and this paragraph provides three pairs of them. The first contrasting pair comes from within the book itself. Inside the city, the king of Nineveh repented and sat (yashab) in dust and ashes, hoping for the city's salvation (3:6). Meanwhile, outside the city, Jonah made a shelter and sat (yashab) under it, wishing for the city's destruction (4:5). While Jonah sat there, God made a plant grow to shade Jonah from the heat. Jonah's response to the plant contrasts with his reaction to Nineveh's turnaround: Jonah was exceedingly glad about the plant (lit. "Jonah was glad concerning the plant—a great gladness"; v. 6) but upset about Nineveh's salvation (literally, "it was evil to Jonah—a great evil"; v. 1).

The second and third contrasts look beyond the book of Jonah. Just like Jonah, Elijah sat beneath a plant and prayed that he might die (1 Kin. 19:4). But Elijah wanted to die because the Israelite king and queen were apostate and did not listen to his message. Jonah wanted to die because the king of Nineveh had listened to his message and he and his people had repented. Finally, Abraham argued with God about the destruction of the wicked, pagan cities of Sodom and Gomorrah because he wanted to preserve them if even a few righteous remained (Gen. 18:23–33). Jonah wanted the wicked, pagan city of Nineveh to be destroyed despite its mass repentance.

Such stark contrasts with characters within and beyond the book highlight how it ridicules Jonah for his narrow-minded bigotry. He was indeed behaving like a silly, senseless dove (yonah; cf. Hos. 7:11). God again asked if Jonah had a right to be angry, this time about the plant that died (Jon. 4:9a). This time Jonah responded that he had every right to be angry (v. 9b), confirming just how self-centered he was and how unwilling to rejoice in the salvation of others. In this book two things make Jonah happy: his own salvation (2:1–9) and the plant shading his head (4:6). Two things make him angry: the salvation of Nineveh (v. 1) and the death of the plant (vv. 8–9). He was glad when God saved him or provided for him, but he was angry when God saved others or withdrew His provision from him. Jonah would not accept the idea that God had any concern for anyone other than Israelites like himself.

4:10–11. Jonah's Anger and God's Final Question. The book concludes with God asking Jonah to consider a challenging point. He reminded Jonah of his pity for the plant, which Jonah neither created nor destroyed. God then asked why He should not have pity on Nineveh if Jonah had such great concern for a plant. God wanted Jonah to understand that the city of Nineveh was far more important than Jonah's plant and the shade it gave him.

The book ends on this question and, at first sight, seems incomplete, for we never hear Jonah's response. However, the book ends on an open question not to encourage speculation about Jonah's possible answer but to challenge readers to answer it for themselves. The Apostle Paul posed the same question using different words (Rom. 3:29). Is the one true God not also the God of the Gentiles? Does He extend hope to all or only to a few? The answer to these questions lies at the heart of the message of the book of Jonah.

MICAH

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The book is named after the Prophet Micah (Micah 1:1). This name, a short form of mikayehu, means “Who is like Yahweh?” It reflects part of the book’s message: the uniqueness and incomparableness of the Lord (7:18). Micah himself authored the book, as indicated by both the first-person editorial note in 3:1 (“I said”) and the personal conviction about the power of his prophetic office in 3:8. Micah hailed from Moresheth Gath (1:1, 14), probably modern Tell ej-Judeideh (Tel Goded), which is located in the lowlands near Lachish and Gath, about twenty-one miles (33 km) southwest of Jerusalem. The byname “Micah of Moresheth” shows that Micah was well known beyond his hometown. He was a contemporary of the older Prophet Hosea and the younger Isaiah. God proclaimed His message through Micah in tears (1:8), with pleading and beseeching (6:1–8). Outside his book, Micah is mentioned only in Jeremiah 26:18, in a context a hundred years later and relating to his prophecy of doom as remembered by some elders in Jerusalem. According to tradition, Micah died peacefully in his hometown during the first half of Hezekiah’s reign.

While some believe that the passages about the return from exile and Israel’s restoration were written at the time of the Exile or later, these messages of hope belong to the twin messages of impending divine judgment and ultimate divine mercy relentlessly proclaimed by all the prophets. Doom and salvation, blessings and curses: all play an integral part in classical prophecy (see Deut. 28). Nothing in the book conflicts with the style and theology of the eighth-century prophets.

Date. According to 1:1, Micah prophesied around 740–700 B.C., during the reigns of three kings of Judah: Jotham (750–735 B.C.), Ahaz (735–715 B.C.), and Hezekiah (716–687 B.C.). The book prominently features the Neo-Assyrian Empire. Partly due to their army of mercenaries and their deportation policy, Assyria was becoming a world power. In v. 1:6, Micah presents the fall of Samaria as still in the future. The Assyrian King Sargon V captured it in 722 B.C. Micah 1:8–16 contains prophecies against particular cities of the Southern Kingdom, which date the book before 712 B.C., when Gath no longer belonged to Judah (1:10). The Assyrians destroyed Lachish in 701 B.C. (1:13). Micah 3:12 reports an Assyrian invasion that apparently succeeded. Verses 5:4–5 refer to another invasion that would fail, most likely Sennacherib’s campaign against Jerusalem in 701 B.C. (cf. 2 Kin. 19; Is. 37).

Backgrounds. The rise of Assyrian dominion put its stamp on the second half of the eighth century B.C. In its wake the Israelite double monarchy came to an end when the Northern Kingdom fell in 722 B.C. Tiglath-Pileser III (745–727 B.C.) campaigned against Philistia in 734 B.C. and came threateningly close to Israel and to Micah’s hometown (2 Kin. 16; 2 Chr. 28; Is. 7–8). Rezin of Aram/Syria and Pekah of Israel formed an alliance against Assyria, but Ahaz of Judah did not join. In the ensuing Syro-Ephraimite war (734–732 B.C.), Ahaz called Assyria for help. Tiglath-Pileser conquered Damascus in 732 B.C., subjugated parts of Israel, and allowed Hosea to take the throne. However, Assyria did not settle quickly. Soon after, Shalmaneser V (727–722 B.C.) besieged Samaria, the capital of the Northern Kingdom, for three years (725–722 B.C.). In 722 B.C. Sargon II (722–705 B.C.) captured it and deported the inhabitants. His son Sennacherib (705–681 B.C.) engaged the western front in 701 B.C. and captured most of Judah. But he had to withdraw from Jerusalem empty-handed (Is. 36–37).

Like the other prophets before him, Micah announced that God would use foreign nations to castigate His covenant-breaking people. He prophesied the siege and fall of Samaria (Mic. 1:6–7) as well as the Assyrian invasion of Judah under Sennacherib (1:8–16), but this only foreshadowed a far greater disaster: the destruction of the temple and the Babylonian Exile (3:12).

Jotham “did what was right” in following the Lord, although the people continued to sacrifice on the high places (2 Kin. 15:34–35). However, his son Ahaz followed the practices of the kings of Israel, sacrificing on the high places with the common people (2 Kin. 16:1–4). He even burned his son in the fire as a sacrifice to a false god, one of the abominable practices of the Canaanites (2 Kin. 16:3). The people’s hypocrisy intensified the situation. Many formally followed the religion of their fathers while simultaneously practicing idolatry. The priests and prophets did not want to lose their popularity, so they tolerated the double standard and predicted peaceful times (Mic. 3:5). Hezekiah attempted to reverse the negative effects of his father’s reign and succeeded to some degree. He trusted in the Lord like no other king of Judah (2 Kin. 18:5; similar to Josiah in 2 Kin. 23:25). It seems that Micah prophesied mainly during the reign of Ahaz and the early years of Hezekiah. He certainly supported Hezekiah in his religious reformation (cf. Jer. 26:18).

The book of Micah provides enough information to sketch the internal situation in Judah. Social exploitation accompanied the religious and moral demise under Ahaz. Everyone in leadership was corrupt. They lived in wealth but ruthlessly oppressed the poor and the marginalized. Micah, often called the “prophet of the poor” by modern scholars, fought for the cause of the poor and the oppressed (Mic. 2:1–11).

Theology and Purpose. Micah oscillates between messages of judgment and doom and messages of mercy and salvation. The core of his message emphasizes that God stays true to His covenant with His people in three ways: He accuses Israel and Judah of sins and transgressions (see 3:8). He announces punishment, specifically the Exile and the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple. And in His mercy, He promises salvation to instill hope for the future.

1. Judgment. Micah’s accusations cover all areas of society. He accuses the wealthy of economic exploitation (6:9–12); the leadership of judicial oppression, bribery, and corruption (chap. 3); and the entire people of social and moral bankruptcy (7:1–7). Micah specifically upholds the principle of representative accountability; that is, leaders are responsible for the people. If the leaders do not walk with God, the people will also err on their path. All are guilty and will suffer punishment, but Micah holds the leaders particularly accountable for not exerting a godly influence. The prophet believed that God would inevitably judge His covenant people. Deportation and exile would come. Israel would go to Assyria (1:16) and Judah to Babylon (4:10). Even Jerusalem and the temple would be destroyed (3:12; 6:16) as the last effective means to lead the people to repent of their sins. As a result, God would save the remnant comprised of those who had returned to Him. Through judgment the Lord sought to continue using Israel to fulfill His plan to save the nations (see “God’s Judgment in the Prophets,” p. 981).

2. Salvation. God is merciful and compassionate; He loves to forgive and to bless (Micah 7:18–20). His promises of hope include the deliverance and restoration of Israel and the glory of the coming messianic kingdom (2:12–13; 4:1–5:15; 7:8–20). He does not restrict salvation to the remnant of Israel but offers hope to all. Although God would punish the nations, He would also give them a part in the promise. They would come to Zion to seek counsel from the Ruler of Israel (5:4) and to receive God’s manifold blessings (4:1–3; 7:12–17) in fulfillment of the covenant promise given to Abram (Gen. 12:3).

3. Messianic Prophecy. The messianic reign provided the only hope for a society in which justice and mercy would prevail. With a few strokes, Micah sketches the reign of the messianic Davidic King born in Bethlehem (Micah 5:2). He would lead “in the strength of the LORD” (5:4) and His influence would encompass the entire world, making Zion the center of the nations. The world would never find peace except at the coming of the One who is peace (5:5). The NT identifies Jesus Christ as the royal Shepherd-King from Bethlehem (Matt. 2:5–6).

4. Remnant Motif. The term “remnant” (she’erit), a keyword in the message of hope, appears in each of the promises of salvation (Micah 2:12; 4:7; 5:7–8; 7:18). Although the expression itself seems to indicate that only a few would survive, the remnant would consist of many people (2:12) and become a strong nation (4:7). The term “remnant” thus serves as an honorific title for the faithful in Israel.

Literary Features. The book takes the form of oracles of judgment followed by oracles of salvation. This pattern subdivides it into three main parts (chaps. 1–2; 3–5; 6–7), each beginning with the imperative “Hear!”/“Listen!” (1:2; 3:1; 6:1).

COMMENTARY

1:1

Prophetic Formula

Like many other prophetic books, Micah begins with the prophetic formula “the word of the LORD that came” (see Hos. 1:1). Micah came from Moresheth, a small town in the south Shephelah, and prophesied in the second half of the eighth century B.C. The reference to three Judean kings—Jotham (750–735 B.C.), Ahaz (735–715 B.C.), and Hezekiah (716–687 B.C.)—indicates that Micah mainly prophesied to Judah. But his prophecies concern both Samaria, the capital of the Northern Kingdom of Israel (Mic. 1:5–6), and Jerusalem, the capital of the Southern Kingdom of Judah (see vv. 5, 9, 12), though they focus on the latter (see Micah: Introduction).

1:2—2:13

Penalty and Promise

The first cycle of judgment followed by salvation focuses on the imminent threat to Samaria (1:6–7), the threat to Judah and Jerusalem (vv. 8–16), and Judah’s social, economic, and religious injustices that were deserving of divine punishment (2:1–11). Though God would war against His people (1:2–5), He would also gather the remnant of Israel and be their Shepherd-Leader (2:12–13).

1:2–5. Yahweh’s Judgment. Micah repeats the imperative “Hear!”/“Listen!” at the beginning of several sections (3:1, 9; 6:1–2, 9; see also Amos 3:1, 13; 4:1; 5:1; 8:4). Elsewhere, he summons the leaders or the people of Judah to hear. But in Micah 1:2, he calls the physical earth and all its inhabitants as witnesses of God’s judgment upon His covenant-breaking people (cf. 6:2). Verses 3 and 4 describe a theophany of the divine Warrior in which the Lord leaves His holy temple (i.e., the heavenly sanctuary and throne room; vv. 2–3; cf. Jon. 2:4, 7; Hab. 2:20) to come down to the earth, obviously ready to judge (cf. Gen. 11:5). As the Creator and Judge, He would trample the heights/high places of the earth, an apparent allusion to Amos 4:13. The disintegrating elements recall the theophany at Mount Sinai (Mic. 1:4; Ex. 19:18–19), except that in Micah’s time the people were not prepared to meet their God. The awe-inspiring, ominous image portrays the natural world as unable to withstand God’s presence when He comes to pass judgment on both kingdoms. The Lord singles out their capitals, Samaria and Jerusalem, as centers of idolatrous practices (Mic. 1:5). Consequently, He would destroy Samaria (vv. 6–7) and devastate the towns of Judah (vv. 8–16). The historical instrument of judgment, though not explicitly mentioned, was the Assyrian army.

1:6–16. Samaria and Judah Lost. The prediction of Samaria’s downfall focuses on its stone buildings and idols. The personification of Israel’s capital as a harlot represents the Northern Kingdom’s religious prostitution with other gods (cf. Jerusalem as a prostitute in Ezek. 16). The God of Israel would repay them accordingly. The prophet laments over the doom of Samaria.

The passage about Judah and Jerusalem also takes the form of a dirge. The prophet physically displayed his grief (Mic. 1:8). The list of eleven villages in vv. 10–16 does not appear to involve any sequence, but all the towns were located in the Shephelah, west and south of Jerusalem, and all were captured or suffered loss during the Assyrian military campaign against Jerusalem in 701 B.C.

The names of the chosen towns create assonance (similar sounds in Hebrew) and wordplays with the prophetic statement associated with them. For example, people would roll in the dust in the “house of dust” (Beth Aphrah/Ophrah); the “beautiful” (Shaphir) would be humiliated in naked shame; no one would go out of “going out” (Zaanan); support would be withdrawn from the “house of withdrawal” (possible meaning of Beth Ezel); “bitterness” (Maroth) would long for good but receive disaster; “deceit” (Achzib/Akzib) would prove a deceitful lie; and an heir/conqueror would come against “inheritance” (Mareshah; vv. 11–15). The first and last places mentioned recall the frailty of the early history of the monarchy in Israel. “Tell it not in Gath” is identical to David’s words in his lamentation for Saul and Jonathan (v. 10; cf. 2 Sam. 1:20). The kebod yisrael (lit. “the glory of Israel”; possibly the nobility, the army, or, less likely, God Himself; cf. 1 Sam. 4:21–22; Is. 17:4) would find refuge in Adullam, the place of David’s refuge (Mic. 1:15; cf. 1 Sam. 22:1). At the climax of the prophet’s lament, he announces the Exile (Mic. 1:16).

2:1–11. Wealthy Oppressors and False Prophets Condemned. Micah directs his oracle of woe in 2:1–5 against the greedy rich in Judah, who acquired more property by oppressing others and hijacking their inheritance, robbing them of their socioeconomic livelihood (v. 2). Like the preflood generation, the affluent continually focused their thoughts and actions on wickedness and evil (cf. Gen. 6:5). As retributive judgment, God planned a time that would be ra' ("evil," "disaster") against Judah, just as He did for Israel (Mic. 2:3; cf. Amos 5:13). The judgment day for the mighty would leave them with no inheritance among "the assembly of the LORD" (Mic. 2:4–5).

Although the Hebrew of vv. 6–11 is difficult, the passage clearly recounts a dispute between Micah and his opponents. His accusation met resistance, so he pinpointed their socioeconomic crimes against their fellow men, women, and children (vv. 6, 8–9; cf. vv. 2–3). To take away God's glory and blessing from children means to despise the human dignity that God conferred on them (v. 9; cf. Ps. 8:5). Consequently, the prophet either warns the passersby to flee or pronounces judgment by ordering the violators to leave (Mic. 2:10). Micah's sarcastic mockery of his adversaries in v. 11 refers back to v. 6. The verb natap ("prophecy," "prattle"; lit. "drip," "dribble" words) occurs three times in v. 6 and twice in v. 11, forming an inclusio (or bracket). Micah, fueled by the Spirit of the Lord, spoke of transgression and sin (3:8), but the unrighteous deserved false prophets (2:11; cf. Is. 28:7).

2:12–13. Hope for the Remnant. God's plans for His people do not end in exile. Micah's first message of hope briefly describes God as the source of salvation. Micah 2:12 introduces the theme of the remnant using the familiar metaphor of the shepherd and his flock (cf. 4:7; 5:6–7; 7:18). God Himself, the royal Shepherd, would assemble and gather the remnant of Israel from exile (2:12; cf. Is. 40:11; Jer. 23:3; 31:8–10). He would deliver His people to safety in the sheep pen (lit. "like sheep in the fold"; cf. Jer. 23:3; Ezek. 34:14) and increase their number enormously (cf. Ezek. 36:37–38). God Himself would break through the enemies to open the way and, in a new exodus, lead His people from exile (Mic. 2:13; cf. 2 Sam. 5:20).

3:1–5:15

False Leaders and a Righteous Ruler

In the second cycle of judgment followed by salvation, the judgment on the unjust leaders of Judah, both political and religious (3:1–12), contrasts with a fantastic future outlook. The Lord will reign in Zion, and the temple will be the religious center of the world (4:1–5). He will gather His people from the Diaspora and judge Israel's enemies (vv. 6–13; 5:5b–15). The messianic King from Bethlehem will bring peace and rule justly from Jerusalem (5:1–5a).

3:1–12. False Leaders Rebuked. In chapter 3, Micah rebukes all of Israel's leadership, including the political leaders (vv. 1–4), the prophets (vv. 5–7), and the priests (vv. 9–12). Each of the three sections follows the same pattern, first naming the accused, then listing their offenses, and finally announcing the penalty. The first and the third sections start with the imperative "Hear!"/"Listen!" (vv. 1, 9; cf. 1:2).

The keyword "justice" encompasses not only judicial justice but also ethics and morality (3:1, 8–9). The rulers perverted good and promoted evil (v. 2). Returning to the shepherd metaphor, Micah uses brutal and graphic language to describe Israel's shepherds mercilessly slaughtering the flock for consumption (vv. 2–3). They should have led and protected the flock as God Himself promised to do (cf. 2:12–13). Because of their love of evil deeds, Micah declares God's sentence of divine silence. Although He had promised to help His people if they cried out to Him (see Is. 30:19), He would not listen to the rulers or answer them (Mic. 3:4). God would completely forsake them.

The prophets also misled the people (vv. 5–7). They no longer spoke for God; they made the content of their prophecies dependent on money. Bribery led to oracles of peace (v. 5). They sanctioned the behavior of the upper class, blessing the rulers who exploited the common people but declaring war on the poor and oppressed who could not pay. Therefore, God would punish them with silence as He would the rulers (vv. 6–7; cf. v. 4; Amos 8:12). They would no longer see visions. In shame, they would cover their faces/lips (lit. "mustache"; Mic. 3:7), an act required of a leper (Lev. 13:45) and practiced in mourning rituals (Ezek. 24:17, 22).

In a rare first-person speech, Micah declares that, in contrast to the false prophets, he is filled with power from the Lord's Spirit, making him God's legitimate prophet (Mic. 3:8). His virtues of justice, strength, and courage enable him to uncover the horrendous condition of the leadership and make it public. He does this in the all-encompassing final rebuke against all of Israel's leaders (vv. 9–12). Their corruption spoiled the entire society. The leadership perverted moral standards and sold “justice” to the highest bidder (v. 9). They built up Zion with bloodshed, proving their hostility toward God (v. 10). Worse, they arrogantly claimed that nothing bad could ever happen to Zion because of the Lord’s presence, a blatant misapplication of Zion theology and the epitome of blasphemy (v. 11; Ps. 46:5; Zeph. 3:15, 17).

Micah 3:12 announces the divine judgment: since the leaders had built Zion (Jerusalem) through bloodshed, the city, including the temple (lit. “the house”), would be devastated. This is the first announcement of the destruction of Solomon’s temple in prophetic literature, and Micah’s audience must have found these words outrageous and shocking. Jeremiah’s contemporaries remembered Micah’s prophecy just before its fulfillment in 586 B.C. when the Babylonians conquered Jerusalem and destroyed the temple (Jer. 26:18).

4:1—5:15. A Righteous Kingdom and Ruler.

After the section on the false leaders (chap. 3), Micah describes the idyllic reign of the Lord in Zion. God’s plan for obedient Israel after the Exile included the future messianic kingdom and its impact on the nations (4:1–4). God would bestow the benefits of the kingdom on all who would come to Jerusalem, including Gentiles. Everyone would worship the Lord, and in Jerusalem the Messiah would lead justly. The vision in Micah 4:1–3 also occurs in Isaiah 2:2–4, with slight variation. The question of which one is original or whether they both used another source might never be resolved beyond doubt. However, Micah 4:1–3 is closely integrated within its context. It contains references that look both backward (Zion, the temple mountain, teaching, judging; cf. 3:10–12) and forward (walking in God’s ways, strong nations; cf. 4:5, 7). The phrase “in the last days”/“in the latter days” refers to the future messianic age, when Mount Zion would be the highest point on earth (4:1). The static aspect of its great height (cf. Ps. 48:2) precedes a description of dynamic movement. The nations would flow into Zion (Mic. 4:2a) and the law out of Zion (v. 2b), making it the hub of the world (cf. Ezek. 38:12).

Many peoples and nations would “go up” to Jerusalem (Mic. 4:1–2; cf. Is. 60:3; Hag. 2:7; Zech. 8:22). The same verb appears regularly in the title of the pilgrimage psalms: “A Song of Ascents” (Pss. 120–134). The imagery of many nations streaming uphill to Mount Zion represents God breaking down national and ethnic barriers. The house/temple of the God of Jacob will truly become “a house of prayer for all nations” (Is. 56:7). All will desire the teaching and wisdom of the Lord and will walk in His paths (Mic. 4:2), making God’s Torah universally effective. The Lord will “judge between many peoples” (v. 3), which refers either to imposing law and order among the nations or to peaceful conflict resolution. In Micah, peace leads to disarmament, not disarmament to peace. Instruments of destruction will become instruments of agriculture when the nations beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks. This line reverses the call for war in Joel 3:10. The United Nations garden in New York City contains a bronze sculpture of a powerful blacksmith beating “swords into plowshares.” Then and now, Micah’s imagery depicts the world’s hope for an end to all wars and conflicts, but Micah insists that only through the teaching of the Lord and an adherence to His law will this hope find fulfillment.

Following God will result in agricultural blessing and peace (Mic. 4:4). Micah’s reference to sitting under a vine and a fig tree evokes a tangible image of safety, a symbol of the pax messianica (“messianic peace”; cf. 1 Kin. 5:5; 2 Kin. 18:31; Zech. 3:10). The concluding formula affirming this as a proclamation of the Lord of Hosts impresses God’s seal on this prophecy (cf. Is. 40:5; 58:14).

Micah follows up his vision of hope with a call for action. He calls the Israelites of his time to walk according to the future vision and to do what all the nations would do in the latter days: to walk in the name of the Lord their God (Micah 4:5; cf. v. 2). “In that day” in vv. 6–8 refers to the time of the glorious kingdom described in vv. 1–3. Micah portrays the Lord as both Shepherd (first-person speech; vv. 6–7a) and King (third-person account; v. 7b). The lame and the exiles/outcasts harmed by the Lord refers primarily to His people as a nation, though it could also refer to the poor classes of society oppressed by the leadership (v. 6; cf. chap. 3). God will make them a remnant, a strong nation among strong nations (4:7; cf. v. 3). The true King is the Lord, and He will reign from His temple (v. 7; cf. v. 2). The Lord will rule in Zion forever. Even at the time of this proclamation, when Israel was in danger of being corrupted by its leaders and taken by foreign nations, God was ultimately in charge. Therefore, even as the people watched God take the kingdom away from them (4:9—5:15), they could hope that He would one day reestablish the former dominion, the glorious Davidic kingdom, with Zion/Jerusalem as its capital (4:8).

Micah 4:9—5:4 is marked by the repetition of the Hebrew word 'attah (lit. "now," or translated idiomatically as "this/that day"; 4:9, 10, 11; 5:1, 4), forming three units: the 'attah of the crying and labor (4:9–10), the 'attah of the assembled nations (vv. 11–13), and the 'attah of the coming king (5:1–4). Each section moves from distress to a turn of events. The first compares Jerusalem's distress to the pain of a woman in labor. In their time of distress, both their king and ruling counselor would disappear, and they would have to go to Babylon (4:9–10; cf. Jer. 6:22–26). This is arguably the first explicit prophetic mention of the Babylonian Exile. However, Israel would experience a new exodus, for the Lord would redeem (Heb. ga'al) His people. Israel's deliverance from exile would correspond to their Jubilee release described in Leviticus 25:25–55, where ga'al occurs ten times.

The second unit describes the nations assembling against Jerusalem, either for battle or to mock them after falling to the Babylonians (Mic. 4:11–13; cf. 7:8–10; Ezek. 36:1–15; Obad. 11–14). But this would result in their undoing, for God planned to gather them for judgment (Mic. 4:12–13). God would make Zion like a threshing animal under His guidance, administering just punishment to the mocking nations (cf. the judgment against Babylon in Jer. 51:33). In the end, the God of Israel would stand as the Lord of the entire world (Mic. 4:13; cf. Ps. 97:5).

The third unit (Mic. 5:1–4) both starts with 'attah (omitted in some translations) and ends with a final 'attah (sometimes translated idiomatically to refer to the future of the prophecy as "at that time" or "then") that envelops all the 'attah sections by stating a purpose: His greatness would "now" (at that time) extend throughout the world (v. 4). As with the other two units, the third starts with a grim look at a hopeless situation. Some translations interpret the Hebrew gadad in v. 1 to mean troops, referring to the futile mobilization of Zion's military power against its enemies. Others render this word as "slash yourself in grief," indicating a rite performed as Zion mourns her siege and fall (588–586 B.C.; cf. Jer. 16:6; 41:5; 48:37). This prediction and the humiliation of Israel's judge/ruler (Heb. shopet) who would be struck on the cheek with a rod (Heb. shebet, a wordplay on shopet) likely refer to the downfall of the king of Judah in 586 B.C. It is less likely that they might refer to Sennacherib's siege in 701 B.C.

The attention shifts suddenly from the large city of Jerusalem to the small village of Bethlehem Ephrathah (Micah 5:2), which demonstrates the folly of underestimating something because it is small. This otherwise insignificant place suddenly becomes important because of the One who would come from there. The Messiah, not strength or size, determines importance. The humble King originated from a small village. "House of bread" (Bethlehem) and "fruitful" (Ephrathah) characterize His rule.

Verse 2 affirms the coming One as a Davidic King. Bethlehem, Ephrathah, and Judah are closely associated with David and his father, Jesse (1 Sam. 16:18; 17:12). The Hebrew word li ("to," "for Me") recalls 1 Samuel 16:1, which uses the same word to describe God choosing David to replace Saul as king. The reference to the rule of the messianic King also recalls God's words to David in 2 Samuel 7:8.

The King would come as a king comes forth for victory (cf. Is. 11:1). He would stand in the service of the Lord because He would come "to"/"for" God, in marked contrast to the present rulers. The dominion of this King is from antiquity (cf. Is. 45:21; 46:10; Hab. 1:12), from the days of 'olam, a word variously translated as "ancient times," "days long ago," "days of old," "former years," "the days of eternity," or "from everlasting" (Mic. 5:2; cf. 7:14; Is. 63:9, 11; Mal. 3:4). These time references seem to indicate the eternal existence of the Messiah. The woman in labor in Micah 5:3 might recall the young woman who would give birth to Immanuel (Is. 7:14), or it could refer back to Zion in labor (Mic. 4:9–10). In any case, God would reverse the fortunes of His people, and the faithful remnant would return from exile.

Micah 5:4 describes the inauguration of the Ruler who would shepherd His people (cf. David as shepherd-king in 2 Sam. 5:2; Ps. 78:70–72). He would stand (i.e., have authority) and reign as the Lord's Representative because He would act in the strength and majesty of the Lord His God. As a result, the flock (Israel) would abide in safety (cf. 2 Sam. 7:10). In Jesus's time the Jews considered this prophecy to refer to the Messiah (John 7:42). Matthew identifies Jesus as the Messiah from Bethlehem (Matt. 2:5–6).

At the climax of Micah 5:2–5a, Micah refers to the coming King as shalom, a word that encompasses peace, welfare, prosperity, friendliness, deliverance, and salvation. It is the best word to describe not only the reign of the King but the King Himself. The threat of Assyria itself was immediate, and Assyria is also a code name for Mesopotamian enemy powers (cf. 7:12; Ezra 6:22; Zech. 10:10–11). The Assyrians and the Babylonians ("the land of Nimrod"; cf.

Gen. 10:8–12) invaded between the eighth and sixth centuries B.C. (Mic. 5:5–6). However, the Messiah would strengthen Israel, rising against the invading Assyrians, a group described as seven shepherds and eight rulers, referring to a plurality of military powers (for similar numerical literary devices, see also Prov. 30:15, 18, 21, 29; Eccl. 11:2; Amos 1:3). Israel would emerge victorious because God and/or the coming King would rescue them from the Assyrians (Mic. 5:6).

The remnant would be like the dew, which brings blessings, and a majestic, invincible lion (vv. 7–9). The subject of the praise in v. 9 could refer to the coming King, to the remnant of Jacob, or to God Himself.

In vv. 10–15 the Lord declares His intention to destroy/cut off (Heb. karat, used four times in vv. 10–13) not just His enemies (v. 9) but also the military protection and pagan Canaanite religious activities that gave Israel a false sense of security, including witchcraft, fortune-telling (Lev. 19:26; Deut. 18:10, 14; Is. 2:6), idols, and pillars (Lev. 26:1). “In that day,” when God would assemble the remnant of Jacob, He would prove the land’s only real security and the only God worthy of worship (Mic. 5:10; cf. 4:6). Then Israel would set their hopes on the Lord alone. The conclusion in 5:15 reveals that God would direct His vengeance not against Israel but against the nations that have not obeyed Him. This unexpected ending shows that vv. 10–14 describe Israel’s cleansing, not judgment. God would renew His covenant with a purified people. Micah’s message for the nations expressed their need to understand that God would both punish Israel and stand by His covenant. They needed to come to Israel (4:1–3) to hear and listen (1:2), for those that disobeyed God would receive His anger and wrath.

6:1—7:20

Judah’s Fault and God’s Forgiveness

The third cycle of judgment followed by salvation presents God’s covenant lawsuit against Judah (6:1–8), another set of accusations and the threatened punishment of Jerusalem (vv. 9–16), and a lament of the bankruptcy of moral values in society (7:1–7). But in the end, hope once again shines forth as the prophet predicts a change in Judah’s attitude toward God and the reversal of their fate because of His compassion and forgiveness (vv. 8–20).

6:1—7:7. Judah’s Sin and Misery. The covenant lawsuit in 6:1–8 consists of the summons (v. 1), the call of witnesses (v. 2), the plaintiff’s address reviewing benevolent acts (vv. 3–5), the defendant’s response (vv. 6–7), and the indictment stating the general covenant stipulations broken (v. 8). The call to “Hear!”/“Listen!” introduces the Lord’s trial against Judah (v. 1; cf. 1:2; 3:1, 9; 6:2). The Hebrew word rib appears as a verb in v. 1 (“plead the case”) and as a noun in v. 2 (“complaint, accusation”). A common term in prophetic literature, it describes a lawsuit between God and His people (Jer. 2:4–9; cf. Is. 3:13–15; Hos. 2:4–25; 4:1–3). God called mountains and hills as witnesses, indicating the universal character of the dispute (Mic. 6:1–2; cf. Deut. 32:1). Though God tried hard to hold them back, Judah, like Balaam of old, continued to follow the wrong path. God saved His people during the Exodus and the wilderness wanderings. He protected them from enemies and an ill-minded prophet (Balak and Balaam; Num. 22–24). He led them over the Jordan from Shittim/the Acacia Grove to Gilgal (Josh. 3:1; 4:19–24). And He provided leadership through Moses, Aaron, and Miriam (Mic. 6:4; cf. Ex. 15:20).

Confronted with the past salvific acts of their covenant God, the people responded with a series of four questions that reveal their wrong attitude toward worship (Mic. 6:6–7). These would-be worshipers offered God what they believed to be increasingly more valuable sacrifices as a show of their commitment. Burnt offerings and year-old calves were common sacrifices (v. 6; Lev. 1; 9:3). Thousands of rams and ten thousand rivers of oil were part of extraordinary offerings during special occasions (Mic. 6:7; 1 Kin. 8:63; 1 Chr. 29:21; 2 Chr. 29:32–35). Micah even speaks of the abhorrent practice of offering firstborn children, though God forbade human sacrifice (Mic. 6:7; Lev. 18:21; Ps. 106:38). God required them to redeem their firstborn (Ex. 13:13; cf. Num. 3:44–51). The people gravely misunderstood God’s desire for far more than sacrifices (1 Sam. 15:22). Confronted with the past salvific acts of their covenant God, the people ought to have worshiped Him in spirit and in truth rather than in outward formalism.

The climactic statement in Micah 6:8 responds to the people’s lack of covenant loyalty by providing them with divine guidelines, the “golden rule” of the OT (cf. Deut. 10:12–13). To act justly forms the ethical basis of society (cf. Mic. 3:1, 9). To love mercy goes even further to restore compassion, kindness, and generosity. To walk humbly with God fully recognizes dependence upon the covenant Lord. Humans should imitate God, who loves justice and mercy (7:18, 20; cf. Ps. 33:5). This statement summarizes the message of the preexilic prophets, the essence of true worship and life within God's covenant.

The verdict of the lawsuit rules against the city of Jerusalem (Mic. 6:9–16). Because of the prevalent injustice of the wealthy oppressors and the cunning merchants ripping off innocent people, it would share Samaria's fate (vv. 10–12, 16; cf. 2:1–11; Amos 8:4–7). God would strike the country with fertility and military covenant curses (Mic. 6:13–15; cf. Lev. 26:26; Deut. 28:30, 39–41). Omri and Ahab—kings of the Northern Kingdom's most prominent dynasty—had set Samaria on a course of destruction (1 Kin. 16:15–22:40). Like Samaria, Jerusalem would also become desolate. Onlookers would hiss and scoff at the city (Mic. 6:16; cf. Jer. 19:8; Lam. 2:15–16).

Micah laments the disintegration of moral principles and solidarity in society, both in public (Mic. 7:1–4) and in private (vv. 5–6). Although the prophet again accuses the leaders specifically (cf. 3:9–11), he refers to universal corruption. No "faithful" (derived from the same Hebrew root as "mercy" in 6:8) or "upright" person remained anywhere (7:2; cf. Ps. 14:1–3). Therefore, Micah announces the approach of the day of the watchman (Mic. 7:4; cf. Ezek. 33:2–9), that is, the judgment he had proclaimed. Even in private affairs, no one could be trusted, not even friends, neighbors, leaders, or household members (Mic. 7:5–6; cf. Matt. 10:35–36). The nucleus of Israelite society, the family, had become corrupted. Everyone stood alone except those who trusted in God (Mic. 7:7). Micah refers to God as his Savior/salvation (cf. Ps. 25:5) and insists that God will hear his prayers (cf. Ps. 55:16–17). He, like the psalmist(s), hoped that God would save him from his plight. Micah uses the first person at both the beginning and the end of 7:1–7, balancing his frustration about society (v. 1) with his declaration of hope in the Lord (v. 7).

7:8–20. God's Forgiveness and Judah's Rise.

The last section completes the book's third cycle of judgment followed by salvation. It consists of four subunits. The first unit affirms that Judah would bear the just wrath of God (7:8–10). But even in such dark times, the Lord would be their light (v. 8). The confession of sin is central to Micah's message (v. 9). Judah acknowledged God's accusations as justified (cf. chaps. 1–3; 6:9–7:7), reflecting a change of attitude (cf. 6:1–8). This confession allowed God to remove Judah's iniquity and transgression (7:18) and to fulfill His promises of salvation (2:12–13; chaps. 4–5). God will justify those who ask for forgiveness, and they will see His righteousness

(7:9; cf. 2 Chr. 7:14). In Judah's case, this included seeing the final fall of its gloating enemy (Mic. 7:10).

The second unit describes the day of reversal for Judah and Jerusalem (vv. 11–13). Judah would become a large, secure country (v. 11). God would return His people from exile (v. 12) and devastate unbelievers in an apocalyptic scene (v. 13; cf. Is. 24:1, 5).

The third and fourth units concern the relationship between God's people and the nations (Mic. 7:14–17) and the relationship between the remnant and their God (vv. 18–20). God would shepherd His people (v. 14; cf. 2:12). In remembrance of the Exodus and the conquest, He would bring His people out of exile and into the promised land in full view of all the nations. As a result, the nations would fear the Lord (7:14–17; cf. Josh. 2:9–11).

The last unit is a short doxological hymn of God's grace and mercy. It starts off with the rhetorical question (v. 18; mi-'el kamoka), an allusion to the prophet's own name (mikah). It recalls the profound question from the Exodus: Could there be any among the gods like the Lord (Ex. 15:11)? Micah illustrates God's uniqueness through His attributes (Mic. 7:18) and His achievements (vv. 19–20), highlighted by His willingness to forgive. Several lexical similarities link the description of God's uniqueness in vv. 18–20 with the positive part of His self-introduction in Exodus 34:6–7. Micah apparently omits God's retributive character because God has already judged (cf. Ex. 34:7). Also, the allusion to Exodus 34:6–7 and the emphasis on judgment in Nahum 1:2–3 (cf. Joel 2:13; Jon. 4:2) balance the emphasis on forgiveness in Micah 7:18–20. Chapter 7 moves from justice to mercy, reflecting the book's main movement from judgment to salvation, from punishment to forgiveness. God would much rather forgive than punish.

Once more the remnant motif appears. God does not forgive everyone without any consideration of attitude. He forgives the faithful remnant made up of those who seek Him (v. 18; cf. 2:12; 4:7; 5:6–7). The unique picture of God hurling sins into the depths of the sea (7:19) recalls Him hurling Pharaoh's army into the sea at the Exodus (Ex. 15:5; Neh. 9:11). Micah goes even further back in time to Jacob and Abraham, showing God's covenant faithfulness throughout the entire patriarchal period (Mic. 7:20). In the end, Micah and the remnant put their confidence in the faithfulness and unchanging love and mercy of God. As long as God is involved in human affairs, there is hope.

NAHUM

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The book begins with information about its primary focus and its author (1:1). It is titled after the Prophet Nahum the Elkoshite, who wrote the oracle against Nineveh, the capital city of Assyria. The name Nahum, a shortened form of Nehemiah (“comfort of Yahweh” or “the Lord comforts”), occurs only here in the OT. It means “consolation” or “comfort,” a fitting name for the prophet and the book because the message of the fall of Nineveh would bring comfort to the people of Judah.

Date. Though scholars debate the date of the book, several clues narrow it to a period in the mid to late seventh century B.C. The mention of the fall of Thebes (No Amon) to the Assyrians in 3:8–10 provides a precise historical anchor point. Assyrian cuneiform texts dated to 663 B.C. record the conquest of the city by Ashurbanipal (669–627 B.C.). The prophet portrays Assyria as a nation of strength, near the height of its power (1:12; 2:11–13; 3:1, 4), and indicates that it still controlled Judah (1:12–13, 15; 2:2). The Assyrian empire began to decline after Ashurbanipal’s death in 627 B.C. Shortly prior, in 629 B.C., King Josiah of Judah (641–609 B.C.) enforced massive religious reforms that would have been impossible had Assyria still maintained tight control of the region. Therefore, Nahum probably prophesied sometime between 663 B.C. and 629 B.C., between the reigns of Manasseh and Josiah, making Nahum a contemporary of Habakkuk, Zephaniah, and the young Jeremiah.

Backgrounds. The book of Nahum is a sequel to the book of Jonah. But Nahum offers no hope for Nineveh. By 722 B.C. the Northern Kingdom of Israel had fallen to a succession of attacks led by Assyrian kings that culminated in Sargon II (721–705 B.C.) removing the last survivors from Samaria and placing them in Babylonia, Media, and Persia. Around 700 B.C., Sennacherib (705–681 B.C.) moved the Assyrian capital city from Dur-Sharrukin (Khorsabad) to Nineveh. In 670 B.C., Esarhaddon (681–669 B.C.), son of Sennacherib, moved other conquered peoples into Samaria and Galilee (2 Kin. 17:24; Ezra 4:2), further weakening the region. Assyria’s brutality reached its peak at the height of the empire, during the reign of Ashurbanipal. Nahum probably prophesied during this time period. Nahum’s prophecy was fulfilled in 612 B.C., when Assyria and King Sin-shar-ishkun (623–612 B.C.) fell to a coalition of Medes under Cyaxares (625–585 B.C.) and Babylonians under Nabopolassar (626–605 B.C.). A small remnant of Assyrians escaped Nineveh in 612 B.C. and fled to Haran, where they made Ashur-uballit II (612–609 B.C.) the new king of Assyria. However, Haran also eventually fell to the Babylonians, making Babylonia the most powerful empire in the ancient Near East.

Theology and Purpose. Nahum’s opening statement summarizes the message of the book: God’s awesome power in wrath and in judgment. God spoke to Judah, but the message concerns Nineveh. The obvious celebration of vengeance against the Assyrians reveals the character of God, forcing the reader to ask what kind of God the book portrays. The answer lies in the two themes addressed in Nahum: judgment and salvation.

1. Judgment against Nineveh. To correctly understand God’s intent here, the book of Nahum must be read after the book of Jonah, which portrays God as compassionate and patient, not wanting any to perish. God’s loving-kindness frustrated Jonah in the mid-eighth century B.C., but now a hundred years later, God had seen enough suffering, not only of His chosen people but also of the surrounding nations. Nahum refers to Nineveh as the city of bloodshed, deception, and pillaging (3:1). He further describes the city as a prostitute engaged in witchcraft

(3:4). God declared that Nineveh and its gods would be karat (lit. “cut off”), indicating complete destruction (1:14–15). In a terrifying tirade, Nahum outlines the nature of Nineveh’s military violence, painting a scene of destruction and death in one breath (3:3) and the naked exposure of Nineveh the prostitute in the next (3:5–7). As punishment, other nations would attack the Assyrians, and they would experience the cruelty of war they themselves had practiced, including the brutal destruction of their children (3:10; see “Introduction to the Prophetic Literature”; see “God’s Judgment in the Prophets,” p. 981). Nineveh had had a chance to repent, but the time for forgiveness was past, and the sovereign God made it clear that justice must prevail against such a wicked city. This was a nation in a state of absolute hopelessness.

2. Salvation for God’s People. Interwoven throughout the oracles of doom against a wicked nation are promises of hope and blessing for Judah. Divine wrath and judgment fill the book of Nahum, but it also contains the consolation that ultimately God will not stand by and allow those who hurt His children to go unpunished. The magnitude of His power matches His apparent slowness to anger (1:3), and He is a shelter in times of distress/trouble (1:7). As a result of God’s judgment on Nineveh (1:12), salvation would come to Judah, and once again God’s people would joyously celebrate their sacred festivals (1:15). But the message also implies a forewarning that Judah might eventually share Nineveh’s fate if oppression and wickedness continued there unchecked. The same message applies today: God will not tolerate oppression and corruption. The book of Nahum declares the universal sovereignty of God; He is the Lord of history, the Lord of nature, and the Lord of destinies. He alone provides a future for His people.

The connection between hope and the fall of Assyria implies at least an eschatological hope. In Nahum, God’s promise that trouble and affliction would not return lies at the heart of this hope. He announces the end of evil extending beyond the evil caused by Assyria, a promise reinforced by the statement that God would finish it completely (1:9). At the end of the book, God describes the wickedness of Assyria in universal terms. Its cruelty had affected everyone (3:19). Consequently, the book constantly emphasizes the absolute extermination of Assyria (1:14–15; 2:10) followed by the resurgence of Jacob in excellence and splendor (2:2). Like Edom in Obadiah, Assyria in Nahum seems to stand for much more than an ancient empire.

It stands for the archenemy who has oppressed God’s people throughout history. The power of God would permanently destroy this enemy, ushering in a new era of peace for His people (cf. 1:15). Isaiah, who also used Assyria as a symbol of God’s ultimate enemy, voiced this same eschatological hope when he announced that the coming Messiah would bring Assyria to an end (Is. 10:20–34).

Literary Features. The book of Nahum contains several woe oracles against Assyria (cf. Is. 13–23; Jer. 46–51). The prophet uses poetic language with vivid, evocative imagery to convey intense moods and sights. He utilizes sound-based wordplays, metaphors (Nah. 2:11–12), similes (1:10; 2:8; 3:12), repetition (2:11–13; 3:15–17), and short, often staccato, phrases. The oracles in Nahum are war poetry with taunting motifs and imagery referencing God as the divine Warrior (1:2–11). They communicate certain judgment, with no mention of redemption for Assyria.

COMMENTARY

1:1

Introduction

The double title in the superscription introduces what follows as both a prophetic pronouncement and the “book” of Nahum’s vision. No other superscription of a prophetic book refers to the contents as a seper (“book,” “writing,” “scroll”). The Hebrew word massa’ (“burden,” “prophecy,” “oracle”) denotes a pronouncement made about or against an entity, in this case, Nineveh. The term khazon (“vision”) also appears in the superscriptions to Isaiah and Obadiah. The author does not mention the source of the vision, but presumably this was a divine revelation.

The location of Elkosh, Nahum’s hometown, is unknown. Early tradition placed it in the territory of Simeon or in Galilee, possibly Capernaum (lit. “village of Nahum”). Later tradition suggests ‘Alqush, a town near Mosul in Iraq. This mountainous site maintained by modern “Assyrian Christians” was home to a Jewish community that survived into the 1940s of the modern era.

1:2–8

A Psalm Praising the Divine Warrior

Nahum begins his oracle by describing God as jealous (1:2; Ex. 20:5; 34:14) and avenging

(Nah. 1:2; Deut. 32:35, 43; Is. 1:24), yet slow to anger (Nah. 1:3). His jealousy and vengeance arise from a justifiable sense of indignation (Ps. 94). He appears in the whirlwind and storm (Nah. 1:3; Jer. 23:19; 30:23) and rebukes the sea (Nah. 1:4; Ps. 106:9). In His presence, the mountains quake, and the hills melt (Nah. 1:5; Pss. 18:7; 46:6; Jer. 4:24; Amos 9:5).

The use of the terms ‘el for God and ba‘al for Lord (Nah. 1:2) may reference Canaanite religious ideas in order to show who is the true God and Lord. The association of God with seas, rivers (v. 4), storms (v. 3), and fire (v. 6) further supports this. Similar imagery of water, sea, floods, storm, and fire/lightning also appears in Psalm 29. The God of Israel, not the Canaanite Baal, controls the fertile regions and rich pasturelands of Bashan in northern Transjordan, beautiful Mount Carmel next to the Mediterranean Sea and close to Lower Galilee, and mountainous Lebanon, the source of luxuriant cedars (Nah. 1:4; Is. 33:9).

God’s anger burns against His enemies; but in contrast, He is a refuge and deliverer for those who khasah (“trust,” “take refuge”) in Him (Nah. 1:7–8; Pss. 27:1; 37:39; Is. 17:10; Jer. 16:19).

1:9—2:2

Judgment on Nineveh and Deliverance of Judah

God’s promise that tsarah (“trouble,” “affliction,” “distress”) would not return indicates that He would not give Assyria another opportunity to torment His people (1:9). In fact, the great power of Assyria disappeared from the pages of history soon after 612 B.C. If Assyria represents God’s archenemy, then this promise would also apply to the eternal destruction of evil at the end of time (cf. Mal. 4:1; Rev. 20–21). The Hebrew word tsarah means not only “trouble” or “affliction” but also “adversity,” “anguish,” and even “calamity.” Isaiah also announced the eschatological end of all affliction/adversity (Is. 65:16). Never again would sin raise its ugly head in God’s universe (cf. GC 504).

At the time of Nahum’s prophecy, Assyria seemed at the height of its power (Nah. 1:12a), which historically was most likely during the reign of Ashurbanipal (669–627 B.C.). Assyria heavily oppressed both Israel and Judah (2 Kin. 16:7–8; 18:13–16; Is. 7:18–25) and did not ease up until the reign of Josiah. They attacked Judah for the last time during the reign of Manasseh

(2 Chr. 33:11) and led him away like an animal to Babylon. But God promised His people that He would no longer afflict them (Nah. 1:12). Instead, He would bring the oppressor, Assyria, to its end (1:13–14).

The fleet feet of the bearer of glad tidings are blessed because the bearer brings news of Nineveh’s imminent fall and the ensuing period of peace for God’s people, when they could once again celebrate the festivals (v. 15). During Josiah’s eighteenth year, Judah celebrated Passover as never before (622 B.C.; 2 Kin. 23:21–25), and by the end of his reign, the Assyrian empire had been completely eradicated. The motif of feet bringing good news also appears in Isaiah 52:7, which announces deliverance from the Babylonians. In Romans 10:15 this motif again appears, but this time the bearer of good news tells of deliverance from sin.

Assyria had scattered nations through mass deportations. Israel fell victim in 722 B.C., and much of Judah was decimated in 701 B.C. However, another nation came to scatter Assyria. The Lord used Assyria as a scourge and rod (Is. 10:5, 24) against both Israel and Judah, but He would restore the majesty of Jacob (Nah. 2:2). This would culminate in spiritual restoration through the coming Messiah (cf. Rom. 9:4–5).

2:3–13

A Vision of the Coming Destruction of Nineveh

The prophecy moves from the restoration of Jacob (2:2) to a lengthy description of the fortification of the city of Nineveh against the coming attack (v. 5). The Babylonians attacked the neighboring Assyrian city of Ashur in 615 B.C. but failed to take it. In the next year, the Medes successfully conquered the city. In 612 B.C., a Median and Babylonian coalition besieged Nineveh for three months before it fell. Excavations have uncovered two preemptive, fortified narrowings of the eastern Halzi Gate, one of the fifteen gates of Nineveh. Within the same area lay the remains of numerous fallen Assyrian soldiers from the 612 B.C. battle. Nabopolassar graphically described his victory over the hated Assyrian enemy: “I slaughtered the land of Subartu (Assyria), I turned the hostile land into heaps and ruins. The Assyrian, who since distant days had ruled over all the peoples, and with his heavy yoke had brought injury to the people of the Land, his feet from Akkad [Babylonia] I turned back, his yoke I threw off.”

Nahum prophesied that the city would be led away captive into exile (v. 7). This certainly refers to the inhabitants of the city of Nineveh but may also refer to the city's goddess, Ishtar, whose temple and its associated cult prostitution dominated the religious lives of Assyrians. Her attribute animal, the lion, figured prominently in Nineveh, especially during the reign of Ashurbanipal. His North Palace is replete with reliefs of lion hunts staged in the expansive grounds within the walls of the city. At the end of the hunt, the killed lions were presented to Ishtar while the king poured libations over the heads of the dead victims.

Nahum's use of lion imagery draws upon the many levels of meaning that the lion held in Assyrian ideology. Assyria had torn apart its victims as a lion tears its prey, but now Assyria itself would be torn to pieces (vv. 11–12) and the stunning wealth of the city looted (v. 9). Using powerful wording, Nahum characterizes the city as desolate, plundered, and devastated (v. 10). In the Hebrew, three words with alliterative similarity (the first two from the same root) express the idea that emptiness signals absolute desolation: buqah ("emptiness," "pillaged"), mebuqah ("void," "plundered"), and mebullaqah ("devastation").

3:1–19

The Sin and Destruction of Nineveh

A declaration of a curse and lament (Heb. hui, "woe") for the city of bloodshed (3:1) succinctly introduces the final focus of this oracle. The single word "woe" contains within it the horrors facing Assyria, while the designation of Nineveh as the city of bloodshed provides the justification for the meting out of those woes.

3:1–4. Woe against Nineveh. Three charges brought against the city justify its ruin: bloody violence (v. 1), deceitful harlotry (v. 4; cf. the Assyrians lying to Hezekiah's men; 2 Kin. 18:31–32), and lion-like plundering of the nations (Nah. 2:11–12; cf. Is. 10:13). The consequences match the crimes: Nineveh would meet a violent end. Just as Assyrian kings had boasted of erecting pyramids with the heads of their enemies, so countless corpses would fill the streets. The city would be exposed and shamed, as befits a lying prostitute (cf. Jerusalem in Jer. 13:22, 26 and Babylon in Is. 47:1–3), and that which the Assyrians had stolen would be stolen from them.

3:5–17. Taunts against Nineveh. God declared that He was against Nineveh (3:5), an idea that first occurs in 2:13, conveying the Lord's determination to destroy the city. Passersby would indeed confirm that Nineveh lay in ruins (3:7), just as the many enemy cities Assyria had destroyed. In vv. 8–10, the mention of the fall of No Amon (lit. "city of [the god] Amun"; see also Jer. 46:25; Ezek. 30:14–16) reflects Ashurbanipal's conquest of the Egyptian city in 663 B.C. Known to the Greeks as Thebes, this city housed the great Karnak temple of Amun. Their alliance with Egypt, Put (probably Libya or possibly Somalia), and Lubim (another poetic name for Libyans) would have made Thebes appear indomitable before it fell. What the Assyrians did to Thebes would now be done to Nineveh. Just as Ashurbanipal "put a dog chain on [the captured leader] and made him occupy a kennel at the eastern gate of Nineveh," so Nineveh's great men would be bound with chains. Nahum calls Nineveh's strongest men 'ishah' (lit. "women"; Nah. 3:13). This cultural insult of the time refers to their physical weakness. Isaiah uses it in reference to the Egyptians (Is. 19:16). Nahum prophesied that fire would devour the bars of Nineveh's gates, and in fact, the Halzi Gate burned in the 612 B.C. battle. Archaeologists have since uncovered the charred remains.

3:18–19. Destruction of Hopeless Nineveh.

Tragically, Judah, like Nineveh, refused God's salvation. As punishment, the Babylonians also conquered them and took them into exile. Other descriptions of Judah during the Babylonian attack of 587 B.C. employ imagery very similar to that of Nineveh's final days: calamities against children (Is. 51:20; Lam. 2:19; 4:1–2), leaders as bad shepherds (Jer. 23:1–2; Ezek. 34:2–10), and passersby clapping their hands (Lam. 2:15). The book of Jonah concludes with God asking, rhetorically, whether He should have pity/concern for Nineveh (Jon. 4:11). In contrast, Nahum ends by asking whether anyone had not suffered Nineveh's relentless cruelty (Nah. 3:19). God had reached out His divine hand to save Nineveh, but they ultimately refused His salvation. The resulting loss forever serves as a lesson in the pages of human history. It also brings hope that in the experience of Nineveh, we can anticipate the ultimate collapse of the wicked.

HABAKKUK

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The book of Habakkuk is the eighth book among the Minor Prophets. Named after the prophet, its Hebrew title (khabaqquq) is probably derived from the root khbak ("to embrace"), which may serve as a key to deciphering the principal message of the book. But Habakkuk had already been expecting God to embrace humans with His love, compassion, and grace. Rather, the prophet himself, as well as all humanity, needed to wholeheartedly embrace God and His word by faith. The Greek Septuagint translation used the name ambakoum, possibly derived from the Akkadian word hambaququ, a type of exotic flower. The Latin Vulgate adopted this name (habacuc), which became the title of most translations.

While the book of Habakkuk does not mention its author, one can assume the prophet himself presumably wrote it since the Lord specifically commanded him to write out the vision plainly (2:2). The book gives no information about Habakkuk's family, occupation, or leadership position in his country of Judah. This is not uncommon because the prophets wrote about God, not themselves. However, Habakkuk states twice that he is a prophet (1:1; 3:1). Among the other prophetic books, only Haggai and Zechariah make this claim in the superscription (Hag. 1:1; Zech. 1:1).

Outside of his own book, nothing from historically reliable sources is known about Habakkuk. The apocryphal book Bel and the Dragon mentions a legend according to which he was miraculously transported to Babylon to feed Daniel in the lion's den. Jewish traditions claim that he was the son of the woman who hosted the Prophet Elisha. This is rather fanciful since Elisha ministered in the ninth century B.C., whereas Habakkuk lived in the late seventh century.

Backgrounds. Although the book does not mention a date, the internal data reveals the historical background. The Northern Kingdom of Israel came to an end when the Assyrians destroyed Samaria in 722 B.C. Nabopolassar (624–605 B.C.) established the Neo-Babylonian Empire, which Nebuchadnezzar (605–562 B.C.) then expanded and fortified. Nineveh, the ancient capital and stronghold of the Assyrian Empire, fell to the Babylonians in 612 B.C. From Judah's perspective, this event happened far to the north. However, when Pharaoh Necho tried to assist the Assyrians in May/June 605 B.C., Nebuchadnezzar, the Babylonian crown prince, defeated him at the battle of Carchemish (2 Chr. 35:20; Jer. 46:2). This unexpected victory removed the whole Syro-Palestinian territory from the strong influence of Assyria and Egypt and opened it up to Babylonian control. Nebuchadnezzar pursued the Egyptian army southward while simultaneously besieging Jerusalem in the late summer of 605 B.C. (Dan. 1:1–2).

Date. The book's prediction of the imminent Babylonian attack on Judah (Hab. 1:6) narrows down the timeframe of the writing of Habakkuk. At the time of this prophecy, Babylon had not yet threatened Judah, but they would soon unexpectedly come. Habakkuk does not write about or allude to the fall or destruction of Jerusalem; he was still waiting for God's judgment upon Judah (2:2–3; 3:16).

Considering the book's internal evidence, Habakkuk probably wrote it during the short period of time after Assyria and Egypt had lost their domination of the land to Nebuchadnezzar but before Babylon's power had grown enough to threaten Jerusalem. This would place Habakkuk after the fall of Nineveh in 612 B.C. but before the battle of Carchemish in 605 B.C. The corrupted state of God's people likely places the book after 609 B.C., when Pharaoh Necho defeated and killed Josiah, the last godly king of Judah, at Megiddo (2 Kin. 23:29; 2 Chr. 35:20–24).

After Josiah's death, it looked like Egyptian supremacy would dominate Judah's future. At that time, Judah lacked a positive figure on the throne in Jerusalem to stop, prevent, or at least slow down the avalanche of evil and violence that spread unrestrained through society. The first part of the book reflects on this unjust and corrupt situation. The prophesied shocking surprise occurred in 605 B.C., when Nebuchadnezzar gained a decisive victory over Pharaoh Necho, making the Chaldeans the new dominant force in the Middle East (Hab. 1:5).

Theology and Purpose. The book of Habakkuk, like the book of Job and Psalm 73, is a theodicy, a response to the question of God's silence in the midst of evil. The prophet expresses frustration with God's way of handling injustice and approaches Him with serious complaints regarding His character, government, judgments, and care for His people. Habakkuk does not understand why God seems to overlook the sins of His people by not doing anything to stop the flood of wickedness. The prophet's questions bring out the main theme of the book: embrace God's word by faith and wait patiently for the fulfillment of His promises because He is reliable.

1. Opening Up to God. Habakkuk differs from other prophetic books in that it contains a dialogue between the prophet and God. In the book, God does not so much speak through His prophet as with His prophet, addressing Habakkuk's questions. This conversation is open and honest but also tough and disturbing. Habakkuk asks hard questions because evil and rebellious people prevail. When calamity strikes, God seems far away. Why does God not intervene and do something against wickedness? Why does He not respond? Why does the holy and just God not punish the guilty when things go wrong? Is God really in control of history? No wonder one of the key themes of Habakkuk is God's justice. The book challenges His character and holiness because, despite the incompatibility between good and evil, God seems to tolerate evil (Hab. 1:3, 12–13).

Dialoguing with the Lord allows Him to provide answers to difficult questions, react to disappointments, heal emotions, and save. God welcomes open, sincere, and honest dialogue. He delights in His children as they pour out their hearts to Him expressing honest thoughts, feelings, and expectations. He reacts to problems, frustrations, and troubles by giving hope and renewed strength. The book of Psalms also contains many sincere and honest prayers full of frustration and emotion.

2. Patiently Waiting and Hoping in the Lord. Even after lamenting in his frustration, Habakkuk is still dissatisfied and disheartened. He needs to learn to look up to God and constantly trust His word as the source of power and courage. Strength does not come simply through crying out to God but through trusting His word. The book underlines the importance of God's promises and previous mighty acts as revealed in Scripture. The fulfillment of His promises instills hope and trust in the human heart. The Lord's past mighty acts prove the reliability of His word even in times of crisis. The prophet as well as the people needed to wait patiently, trusting God's word. Meaningful and true answers to real-life problems do not come suddenly; they come at the end. Although God's way often seems paradoxical, waiting for Him is necessary (see 2:3).

Thus, Habakkuk provides a crucial example of what it means to live by steadfast trust (2:4): trusting God's word and waiting unwearingly on the Lord in times of crisis or prosperity. The prophet's point is clear—God's word alone provides security. Trusting in Him means believing in His word, relying on it, and living according to it. This trust brings inner peace and joy even in times of national and personal adversity. The deep undertone of the book encourages believers to cultivate God's presence in their lives through a personal relationship with Him. Trusting His word opens our eyes to see Him even though He is not visible to our naked eyes.

3. The Wicked and the Righteous. The book contrasts the righteous with the wicked. The key phrase that the righteous live by steadfast trust (2:4) means that the believer needs to embrace the word of God by faith and wait patiently on the fulfillment of His promises. Such promises not only reorient us but also address life's problems and empower us to go forward in hope. On the other hand, the wicked, typified by the Babylonians, have no future because they are proud, self-centered, violent, and arrogant. Habakkuk describes five woes that result in disaster for the wicked (2:6–19).

The book attests to the importance of prayer. The righteous pray. The prophet directly addresses God and recalls His past mighty acts. He wishes that God would renew them in his day (3:2). The last chapter forms a prayer or hymn culminating with a doxology where the prophet expresses His full trust and joy in the Lord (3:17–19).

4. The Righteous God Overcomes Evil. Habakkuk uses several different names and titles for God, including Lord, Sovereign God, and Savior. Even when God's power and presence are invisible, He provides joy and strength, enables a victorious walk, and empowers His people to go through life singing. Thus, in the midst of life's troubles, the prophet underlines the true source of happiness and joy as the Lord who strengthens and saves (3:18–19).

The book attests that God will inevitably judge humanity and hold them accountable because He created them. Habakkuk understood that God would judge Judah and the nations for their wickedness and rebellion. But he could not comprehend how God could use the Babylonians as His agents of judgment. They were more wicked than the inhabitants of Judah! Hence he questioned whether the punishment fit the crime (1:12–13). God assured him that although He may delay His judgments, they would certainly come at the appropriate time (2:3; 3:16). This called for patience. The prophet needed to wait for the fulfillment of God's word, to learn to live with his questions while relying on the divine promises.

The prophet concludes his book by saying that he would wait patiently with the Lord as his strength (3:16, 19). In the midst of calamities, violence, disorder, evil, unanswered questions, and disappointments, believers must look up, embrace the Lord by faith, and stand firm on His promises because He is a righteous God. This trust in the Lord gives hope, courage, joy, and a renewed motivation to press on.

Literary Features. The book of Habakkuk is unique when compared to other prophetic material. Habakkuk does not simply prophesy but rather poses pertinent questions to God regarding Judah's current disturbing situation and other issues impacting himself. The dialogue between the prophet and God is an exceptional literary feature. The different discourses contain rhetorical features that require close attention in order to discover the meaning of the overall message. The book has a very straightforward literary structure divided into two main sections: Habakkuk's dialogue with the Lord (1:2–2:20) and his prayer with a concluding hymn (3:1–19). Both these sections contain several subsections.

COMMENTARY

1:1–3:19

THE LORD IS MY STRENGTH: WHEN EVIL REIGNS AND FAITH NEEDS TO WAIT

In spite of his serious questions, frustrations, and disappointments with how God treats evil and judges the guilty, Habakkuk ultimately recalled God's past mighty acts, enabling him to trust God's promises and joyfully wait for the fulfillment of His word. Habakkuk was a prophet of hope.

1:1–2:20

Dialogue with the Lord

After a brief introduction to the book (1:1), the prophet expresses his disappointment with the Lord (vv. 2–4), and God answers (vv. 5–11). Habakkuk then complains further (1:12–2:1), prompting God's final response (2:2–20). Because God had delayed His response to evil, Habakkuk questioned His reputation, His holiness, and ultimately His ability to rule and care for His people. At the end, the prophet saw the majesty of God in His temple and was reverently silent because He understood that God, in His timeline, would bring judgment on the wicked and punish the arrogant. The Babylonians would answer for their wicked behavior.

1:1. Introduction. The introduction identifies Habakkuk as God's spokesperson. It characterizes the revelation he received as a massa'. This Hebrew word can mean "burden" as well as "oracle" or "prophetic utterance." The first nuance would suggest that carrying the divine message was a heavy burden. Habakkuk had a difficult role because, although he had received God's word, it required him and his listeners to wait for its fulfillment. The message he received (lit. "saw" in a vision), gave him special historical insights that helped him gain a better perspective on life. As a prophet, he spoke on behalf of God, reminding the people of God's faithfulness, care, judgments, and sovereignty.

1:2–4. The Prophet's Disappointment with the Lord. The book opens not with the expected revelation from God but with the prophet's lamenting and complaining. A tough dialogue between the prophet and the Lord ensues. In frustration, Habakkuk confronted God with forceful, pointed, and dramatic questions: Why are You silent? Why do You not intervene? Why does evil among Your people continue unpunished? How long will You not listen and save? The phrase "how long" occurs sixty-five times in the Bible (see Pss. 6:3; 13:1–2; 74:10; Rev. 6:10) and usually invites divine intervention in undesirable situations. Six keywords describe the condition of Israelite society—injustice, wrong, destruction, violence, strife, and conflict—and Habakkuk passionately detested this situation. The law was powerless/paralyzed, meaning that God's teaching was ineffective, not respected or honored. For the first time the prophet mentions two opposite groups of people: the righteous and the wicked.

Habakkuk's questions show his bitterness and deep disappointment. He could not understand why God did not answer his prayers and intervene to punish evil. But he did right by bringing all these frustrations and negative emotions to the Lord. He invoked Him as "LORD" (Yahweh), which designated Him as a close, personal God, the God of His people, the God of the covenant.

1:5–11. God's Answer: The Babylonians will Punish Judah. God assured the prophet that He was about to do a strange and unbelievable work. He would use the Chaldeans (Babylonians) as His instrument to punish Judah. Three events fulfilled this shocking prediction: (1) In 605 B.C., the Babylonians besieged Jerusalem and took Daniel and other young nobles into captivity (Dan. 1:1–5). (2) In 597 B.C., the Babylonians deported King Jehoiachin along with ten thousand others, including Ezekiel (2 Kin. 24:10–16; Ezek. 1:1–3). (3) In 586 B.C., Judah lost its autonomy, and the Babylonians destroyed Jerusalem and the temple (2 Kin. 25:1–12). Habakkuk never mentions the fall or destruction of Jerusalem, suggesting that he wrote the book before the invasion. The Lord characterizes the Babylonians as behaving like animals, ruthless, violent, selfish, and proud. But in the end, they would also experience divine judgment according to the law of retribution. This happened in October 539 B.C., when Cyrus, the Medo-Persian king, conquered them (see Dan. 5:28–30; 6:28; Is. 45:1–4).

1:12—2:1. The Prophet's Complaint. Habakkuk struggled with the Lord's answer and became even more frustrated, leading him to question God's character. If the Lord is holy, how can He tolerate evil and wickedness? Furthermore, how can He use a more wicked people (Babylon) to punish a less wicked people (Judah)? The Babylonians played with human lives like fishermen with fish (1:14). The metaphor of catching enemies in nets symbolizes power, defeat, and judgment. The book mentions violence five times (1:2–3, 9; 2:8, 17). In the book of Genesis, the same word describes the condition of society in Noah's time (Gen. 6:11). Why is God silent when injustice prevails even among His people? The book of Psalms contains similar expressions of frustration with God's apparent silence in the face of evil (see Pss. 83:1; 109:1). But Habakkuk insisted on hearing the Lord's response (Hab. 2:1). By His powerful word, God created the world, and as the incarnated Word, He redeemed the world. When He speaks, tangible things occur because of His creative power (Ps. 33:9).

2:2–19. God's Answer: The Punishment of the Babylonians. The Lord responded that Habakkuk would have to wait patiently for Him to act. The implementation of God's revelation would take time (2:2–3; see Ezek. 18:32; 2 Pet. 3:9). At the core of the book, Habakkuk 2:4–5 contrasts the wicked with the righteous. The Lord describes the wicked as prideful, deceptive, arrogant, selfish, greedy, violent, and shallow. The wicked, modeled by the Babylonians, live without God, controlled by their own decisions and evil passions. The righteous, on the other hand, live by personal steadfast trust, not by visions, dreams, proofs, or miracles. They live by embracing God and trusting His word, patiently waiting for its fulfillment. They find their strength in His promises because His word is trustworthy. Paul says that the believer lives by faith rather than by sight (2 Cor. 5:7). A passage in the Talmud suggests that Habakkuk narrows all the commandments of the Torah down to one command: Israel must live by its faith in God.

Scholars debate both the meaning of the Hebrew word 'emunah ("faith," "faithfulness," "trust") and the antecedent of the pronoun "his." The word 'emunah does not mean "faith" in the sense of "belief" so much as "steadfast trust" in the sense of one's commitment to God. In Habakkuk, it means recognizing God as the only One who can preserve life and holding on to Him in the midst of uncertainty. The Septuagint, the Greek translation of the OT, reads "my faithfulness" (i.e., God's faithfulness), suggesting that it is God's faithfulness to His promises that preserves the lives of His people. The Hebrew plausibly refers to God's faithfulness. However, the contrast with the wicked (Hab. 2:4a), described as proudly relying on their own strength for survival, shows that the pronoun refers to those who rely on the Lord. In 1:12–17 the prophet contrasts the wicked with the righteous, represented by Babylon and Judah, respectively. Since 2:4 is part of God's response to the prophet's question, the righteous one who lives by faith may refer to Judah as a nation and the proud one may refer to Babylon (vv. 4–5). But the existence of both the wicked and the righteous within Judah (1:1–4) implies that in the coming disaster only those totally committed to the Lord would survive.

God promises life to the righteous but pronounces five woes against the wicked (2:6–19). The first woe condemns greediness, plundering, dishonesty, and violence (vv. 6–8) and describes the wicked as proud, selfish, violent, greedy, lacking self-control, and idolatrous. The second condemns exploitation, covetousness, and pride (vv. 9–11). The third condemns injustice and crime (v. 12).

In the middle of this list of woes God proclaims His lordship and His intention to reveal Himself and fill the earth with His glory (vv. 13–14; cf. Num. 14:21; Ps. 72:19; Is. 6:3; 11:9). Humanity will acknowledge Him as the Lord, recognize the beauty of His character, and understand His presence in human affairs. This positive message affirms God's control even though His presence may not be recognized.

After this brief interlude, the list of woes continues. The fourth woe condemns intemperance and the resulting immorality and lack of self-control (Hab. 2:15–17). And the final one condemns the constant problem of idolatry (vv. 18–19). Instead of recognizing God's benevolence in their prosperity and success, the Babylonians attributed their victories to their gods, represented by idols (cf. 1:11). This section concludes with an important theological statement affirming the Lord's presence in His temple and commanding all to remain silent. Though people on earth could not yet perceive God's holy, dazzling, and awesome presence (see Gen. 28:16–17; Is. 6:1–9), the faithful could find rest and peace in the middle of real threats because the Judge of all the earth had taken His seat and would soon pronounce judgment against the wicked.

3:1–19

The Prophet's Prayer: Talking Confidently to God

This section includes a brief introduction (3:1), a discussion of God's awesome deeds (vv. 2–15), a hymn (vv. 16–19a), and an epilogue (v. 19b). The book begins with questions but ends with a magnificent affirmation. The prophet, silent since the beginning of chapter 2, eloquently expresses his full confidence in God in a powerful prayer. After perceiving God's awesome presence, he contemplated God's past mighty acts. He stood in wonder before the Lord's miraculous interventions in the history of His people. Relying on these accounts, the prophet asked God to again intervene according to His timing. Then people would stand in astonishment before the Sovereign God, who deals with evil and saves the

Habakkuk 2:4 and the New Testament

Three NT epistles mention the phrase in Habakkuk 2:4 about the righteous living by faith.

1. In Romans. For the apostle Paul, this central thought demonstrated that God's righteousness comes by His grace through faith in Christ Jesus (see Rom. 1:16–17). According to his reading, the text does not simply refer to the believers' faithfulness to God but to the saving faith in Christ that makes faithfulness possible. Paul considered this key prophetic text on justification by faith as complementing texts from the Torah (Gen. 15:6) and the Writings (Ps. 32:1–2). These connections between the Pentateuch and the Prophets strongly attest to the continuity between the teaching regarding redemption in both the OT and the NT. There has always been only one way of salvation—by God's grace through faith in Him.

2. In Galatians. In Galatians, Paul underlines the fact that the law cannot save anyone, otherwise Christ would have died in vain. The law, however, continues to be an important guide for the believer (Gal. 5:6, 13–14). When Paul speaks about the misuse of the law and explains that Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, he shows that the law cannot justify. In God's sight, the righteous live by faith (Gal. 3:11). God justifies those who place their trust/faith in Christ.

3. In Hebrews. Hebrews 10:36–38a references Habakkuk to show that only by faith can a believer confidently and victoriously persevere through trials, conflicts, and the crises of life. While Paul uses Habakkuk 2:4 to underscore justification based on a saving faith in Christ, the book of Hebrews uses the passage to encourage maintaining faith in God to endure the hardships of life. The apostles explained to the church the different theological elements all packaged in Habakkuk 2:4.

righteous. Interestingly, the Lord does not speak at all in chapter 3. The entire chapter contains Habakkuk's expression of full trust in the Lord in response to His revelation. He would look up in hope and find power and joy in the Lord.

3:1. Introduction. Recalling how God had fulfilled His promises in the past encouraged the prophet to face tomorrow and strengthened him to live in the midst of calamity. God's faithfulness to His covenant forms the background of this prayer. Two Hebrew musical terms (not always translated into English) attest to the poem's status as a psalm sung as part of the temple liturgy: shigyonot may designate changes in the mood and rhythm (3:1), and selah may indicate a change in melody (vv. 3, 9, 13). In addition, v. 19 contains a specific notation for the music leader.

3:2–19a. God's Past Awesome Deeds. In this passage, Habakkuk portrays God as a divine Warrior (cf. Ex. 15:3; Deut. 1:30; Zeph. 3:17). Using the Exodus from Egypt as background (Hab. 3:2–10), Habakkuk pleads with God to show His mighty deeds in his time (lit. "in the midst of the years"). This is the only place in which this phrase appears in the OT connected with time. The prophet wishes for God to act, to intervene, and to again reveal His mighty actions and His mercy. God does not require blind trust but trust built on His past mighty acts. Because He saved His people in the past, we can have confidence for the future.

The reference to Teman in v. 3 points to Edom in the south (Is. 43:6), and Mount Paran represents Sinai (Deut. 33:2). With poetic language and colorful imagery, the prophet recalls Israel's liberation from Egyptian slavery. God opened the Red Sea (Ex. 13:17–14:31) and led His people on dry ground across the Jordan River (Josh. 3:3–17; 4:21–24). Later, He stopped the sun during Joshua's victory at Gibeon (Josh. 10:12–14; cf. 2 Kin. 20:9–11; Is. 38:8) and gifted the promised land to His people (Hab. 3:11–12).

Habakkuk 3:13–15 recalls God's triumphant victory over the powers of evil. Habakkuk remembers some of the greatest events in the history of God's people: the Exodus, the covenant at Sinai, and the conquest of Canaan. God accomplished all these splendid and magnificent deeds. As He led Israel during that time, so will He lead His faithful ones to the final day of victory, when they will rejoice in His salvation. This eschatological perspective anticipates its ultimate realization at the Second Coming of Jesus Christ.

The Anointed One of v. 13 is the Messiah, the Representative of Israel. Because God remembered His covenant promise to send the Seed (Gen. 3:15) and to protect and preserve the ancestral line of the coming Messiah, He would intervene and save His people. When the fullness of time came, God sent His Son, Jesus Christ, the Savior of the world (John 1:12; Gal. 4:4).

In the end, Habakkuk did not respond to disaster in fear and trembling but in triumphant faith (Hab. 3:16–19a). His powerful concluding confession of faith provides a model for trusting the Lord. His total dedication is exemplary. Habakkuk went from the theological crisis (chap. 1) to triumphal faith because God taught him the difference between the wicked and the righteous. Like Thomas in the NT, he grew from doubts to a full trust in the Lord. In this way, he encourages his readers to be faithful to the Lord, which gives the book a pastoral aspect. When the prophet finally looked fully to God, his joy burst forth in a prayer of trust in the Lord (3:18–19). God's past mighty acts bring peace, assurance, and new hope for the future by building trust in God and in His word.

This culminating passage presents one of the best OT confessions of trust in the Lord. These verses express full confidence in God's goodness and care in spite of disappointments, difficulties, and the tragedies of life. Despite everything going wrong, the prophet vows to stay with the Lord, not only clinging to His word but actually rejoicing in the Lord. Why could he rejoice? Because the Lord was His strength! In the past, God had proven the sufficiency of His promises by fulfilling His word, and this satisfied Habakkuk. He could go forward in full confidence knowing that God is still on His throne.

3:19b. Epilogue—Sing It! The book ends with a seemingly strange note dedicated to a musician, giving instructions to play it on "my stringed instruments" (v. 19). Habakkuk designed the whole book, or at least the prayer of chapter 3, for singing purposes in public worship (see also v. 1). The message of the book of Habakkuk needs to be part of our personal experience. Trust and joyfulness in the Lord should be our song. The cantillation of the text serves to strengthen our confidence in the Lord as a collective expression of faith, trust, and joy in Him. Singing expresses thankfulness, reminds us of God's promises, ties us together, and brings victory (see Ex. 15:1–21; Deut. 31:19, 30; 32:1–47; 2 Chr. 20:22; Rev. 15:3). Despite incomprehensible struggles, Habakkuk anticipates God's ultimate triumph.

ZEPHANIAH

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The book of Zephaniah is the ninth of the Minor Prophets and bears the name of its author. However, scholars debate the meaning of the name. The majority hold that it means “yah[weh] has hidden/protected,” from the root tsapan (“to hide,” “to conceal”) and the shortened form of the divine name, yahweh (i.e., yah). Others suggest that it means “watchman of yah[weh],” from the root tsaphah (“to watch”) and yah. The book identifies the Prophet Zephaniah as the great-great-grandson of Hezekiah (1:1). Although not explicitly stated, the unusual length of this genealogical note seems to imply a reference to the famous King Hezekiah of Judah. No other superscription in a prophetic book traces the prophet’s ancestry as far back as four generations.

Date. Zephaniah prophesied during the reign of Josiah (1:1), the son of Amon and grandson of the notorious Manasseh. Josiah ruled the kingdom of Judah from 641 to 609 B.C., so the prophet must have ministered within this timespan. More specifically, Zephaniah predicted the destruction of Nineveh (2:13–15), which occurred in 612 B.C. The repeated mention of Judah’s wickedness (cf. 1:4–6, 8–12; 3:1–3, 7) probably points to the time before Josiah’s reform, which picked up steam with the discovery of “the book of the law” in 622 B.C. These observations place Zephaniah’s ministry in the first half of Josiah’s reign, perhaps around 630–625 B.C. Yahweh likely raised him up as a prophet to further the spiritual revival during the reign of Judah’s last godly king.

Backgrounds. The fall of Samaria in 722 B.C., an event that brought about the end of the Northern Kingdom of Israel, should have warned the leaders of the Southern Kingdom of Judah about the possibility of divine judgment.

But wickedness and apostasy characterized the reigns of Manasseh (697–643 B.C.) and Amon (643–641 B.C.). When Josiah (641–609 B.C.) ascended the throne, the people of Judah participated in many kinds of foreign cults and worshiped various astral deities and Canaanite gods (1:4–5; cf. 2 Kin. 23:4–25). These spiritual and moral lows threatened the kingdom’s very existence. Judean society was on the brink of collapse. At this critical moment for the nation, God called Zephaniah to warn the people of impending judgment.

Zephaniah’s ministry overlapped with the early part of Jeremiah’s ministry. Around this time, the tumultuous international scene saw Assyrian power declining, while Babylon grew in might under Nabopolassar. Babylon would soon pose a serious danger to its neighboring countries, including Judah. Egypt also periodically threatened Judah. God called Zephaniah to his prophetic ministry during a time of serious political and moral decline in Judah.

Theology and Purpose. The book of Zephaniah affirms the need for God’s people to remain faithful to the covenant relationship. The prophet highlights the impending Day of the Lord, when Yahweh would judge Judah for their continued apostasy and idolatry. But He would also preserve a faithful remnant to fulfill His mission to the nations. The Day of the Lord would bring both justice and mercy.

1. The Day of the Lord. Zephaniah’s message revolves around the coming of the Day of the Lord, when God would judge the whole world and vindicate a faithful remnant. Through His prophet, God describes the Day of the Lord as an imminent day of war (Zeph. 1:7, 14), a dark, cloudy day of gloom, desolation, and ruin (1:15–16). He does not take pleasure in proclaiming judgment and destruction, but He offers a warning to call His people to seek Him and to save them from destruction (3:17–20). For the wicked, the Day of the Lord would bring judgment and divine punishment (1:7–3:8); for the righteous, salvation and hope (3:9–20). It would have both a historical fulfillment (2:4–15) and an eschatological one (3:8–13), affecting both God’s covenant people (1:4–13) and the nations (2:4–15). The NT refers to the same epochal event using a variety of phrases, including “the day of judgment” (Matt. 10:15; 11:22, 24; 12:36; cf. 2 Pet. 3:7), “the last day” (John 6:39–40, 44, 54; 11:24; 12:48), “the day of the Lord” (Acts 2:20; 1 Cor. 5:5; 2 Cor. 1:14; 1 Thess. 5:2; 2 Thess. 2:2; 2 Pet. 3:10), “the day of Christ (Jesus)” (Phil. 1:6, 10; 2:16), “the day of God” (2 Pet. 3:12), “the great day” (Jude 6; cf. Rev. 6:14, 17), and “the blessed hope” (Titus 2:13). All these refer to the day of Christ’s Second Coming. Believers should look forward to this event and prepare the world as well as themselves for that day.

2. Justice and Mercy. Zephaniah describes Yahweh as a God of justice and judgment as well as love and mercy. In fact, God’s wrath springs from offended love, resulting in a mixture of judgment and mercy. He promises to slaughter the wicked in His anger (Zeph. 1:2–18) but also to intervene for His people, restoring and exalting the remnant of Judah and Israel, the meek and humble who trust in His name (2:7, 9; 3:12). He would reign over them as the King of Israel, and His people would no longer fear (LXX, “see”) evil (3:15).

Literary Features. Zephaniah delivers a direct and forthright message using rich and concise language that manifests powerful rhetorical skills. He vividly portrays the destructive character of the Day of the Lord through imagery of war and devastation (1:2–3, 15). The book contains three main sections: the judgment upon Judah (1:1–18), the judgment upon the nations (2:1–15), and the destruction of Judah and preservation of the faithful remnant (3:1–20).

COMMENTARY

1:1–18

JUDGMENT UPON JUDAH

Chapter 1 focuses on God’s judgment of Judah. The description of the Day of the Lord reveals that continued apostasy and idolatry had made Judah’s destruction inevitable (see “God’s Judgment in the Prophets,” p. 981).

1:1

Superscription

Verse 1:1 introduces the author and the time-frame of his message. The book begins, as some other prophetic books do, by stating that the word of the Lord came to the prophet (see Hos. 1:1; Joel 1:1; Jon. 1:1; Mic. 1:1). If the name Zephaniah means “Yahweh has hidden/protected,” it is a fitting name for a prophet conveying an urgent but unwelcome message to a wicked people. Zephaniah was probably of royal descent, giving him access to Josiah, the king of Judah, during whose reign he ministered. Being a godly king, Josiah might have listened to Zephaniah and other contemporary prophets, who would have encouraged the reforms the king undertook.

1:2–6

Destruction Declared

Yahweh first directed His judgment against all living things (Zeph. 1:2–3) and then focused on His people, Judah (vv. 4–6). Verses 2–3 proclaim the Lord’s devastating judgment. Because of the intensity of His wrath and indignation against all kinds of evil, God would destroy everything, including humanity, animals, birds, and fish, in a divine act of uncreation (v. 3; cf. Gen. 1). Human sin had caused all nature to groan and suffer (cf. Rom. 8:21–22).

While Zephaniah 1:2–3 portrays Yahweh’s judgment as universal, vv. 4–6 focus on the judgment of Judah and its inhabitants. Judgment would begin with Judah and Jerusalem. They deserved punishment more than others because they had committed deliberate apostasy against their Lord. Their main sin—idolatry—included the worship of Baal and the stars of heaven, gods worshiped by the Canaanites and Assyrians (cf. Deut. 4:19). Led by idolatrous priests (Zeph. 1:4), they professed loyalty to God verbally but in practice swore by Milcom/Molek (Heb. malkam)—an Ammonite deity for whom Solomon had built a high place to please his foreign wives (1 Kin. 11:5–7).

The Lord mentions three groups of people: those who worship the host of heaven, those who swear oaths by both Yahweh and Milcom/Molek, and those who turn/have turned back from the Lord and from seeking Him. In those days, as today, it was fashionable to profess and practice syncretism (i.e., combining the worship of Yahweh with that of other gods or powers). But the worship of the true God is incompatible with the worship of other gods.

1:7–18*The Day of the Lord

This section contains two subsections that start with the imminence of the Day of the Lord. 1:7–13 describes the judgment of Judah on the Day of the Lord, and vv. 14–18 further describe the Day of the Lord in universal terms.

1:7–13. The Destruction of Judah on the Day of the Lord. Zephaniah portrays the Day of the Lord as a sacrifice prepared by Yahweh Himself. The sacrifice in 1:7 represents the destruction of the guilty nation of Judah, and the invited and consecrated guests represent the foreign nations the Lord would use as instruments of punishment (cf. Is. 13:3). The Hebrew word qadash (“holy,” “consecrated”) here seems to mean “set apart for a special purpose.” Thus some translations render the word as “invited.” In the context of Zephaniah, this refers to the Babylonians (cf. Hab. 1:6). The Lord would punish Judah’s princes/leaders/officials as well as the king’s children—the members of the royal family. They had all transgressed the law and deserved punishment. Their foreign apparel reflects their adoption of heathen values and customs, including idolatrous worship (cf. Is. 3:16–24). They would leap over the threshold, possibly pointing to the heathen practice of not stepping on the threshold when entering a temple (Zeph. 1:9; cf. 1 Sam. 5:4–5). The second part of Zephaniah 1:9 also suggests a possible reference to servants who ignored boundaries when carrying out commands to enrich their wicked masters. The Fish Gate (located on the north side), the Second/New Quarter (where the rich lived, northwest of the temple), Maktesh/Mortar (probably a market district), and the hills (including Ophel, Zion, and Moriah) were all sections or places within Jerusalem. As the capital of Judah, Jerusalem represented the whole nation (vv. 10–12). Yahweh’s inevitable judgment would begin with His people, Judah, because of their deliberate apostasy. They violated the Lord’s explicit commands by repeatedly worshiping the idols of surrounding nations.

1:14–18. Further Description of the Day of the Lord. Verses 1:14–18 contain the most detailed description of the Day of the Lord of any passage in Scripture. Although vv. 7–13 make Judah the immediate object of destruction, the lack of any specific reference to Judah in 1:14–2:3 and the proclamation of judgment against foreign nations in 2:4–15 seem to allow for a universal application of the Day of the Lord. Indeed, the final Day of the Lord would bring judgment not only to Judah and the surrounding nations but to the entire world. The word “day” occurs seven times in 1:15–16, reflecting the seven days of Creation (Gen. 1–2). As God created this world in seven days, He uses seven “days” to proclaim its destruction.

The prophet uses five pairs of words to describe the Day of the Lord. The first pair describes the distressing emotional pain that the day would bring; the second, the devastating physical destruction of the earth; the third, the terrible scene of darkness and gloom; the fourth, the feeling of utter helplessness before the black storm clouds; and the fifth, the sounds of battle trumpets warning of attacking enemies. On that day, people would try to save themselves with silver or gold (Zeph. 1:18), only to find them useless before the God of righteousness and justice. On this day of the Lord’s wrath, He would pour out the blood of the wicked like dust and their intestines like excrement (v. 17).

Zephaniah emphasizes the imminence of the coming judgment (v. 14) as the NT emphasizes the imminence of the Second Coming of Christ (Rev. 22:12). On that day, the Lord would bring the bitterness of war against the impenitent, and His jealousy would burn like fire to devour the whole earth/land (Zeph. 1:14, 18). These “prophecies of impending judgment upon Judah apply with equal force to the judgments that are to fall upon an impenitent world at the time of the second advent of Christ” (PK 389).

2:1–15*JUDGMENT UPON THE NATIONS

Chapter 2 exhorts Judah to repent and declares judgment against five neighboring nations. The aftermath of the divine punishment would prove more disastrous for these nations than for Judah, from whom God would preserve a remnant (vv. 4–7).

2:1–3*Urgent Call to Seek Yahweh’s Mercy

Because of their wickedness, Judah deserved destruction just like the heathen nations (cf. 2:4–15). However, Zephaniah offered them the hope of mercy if they repented. The meek/humble of the land refers to the righteous, and to “seek the LORD” means to seek righteousness and humility (v. 3). Zephaniah both urgently summons the wicked to repent of their ways and return to the Lord and encourages the righteous to continue to uphold His commands of justice. The threefold repetition of “before” in v. 2 emphasizes the urgency of the call to repent and seek the Lord. He might hide/shelter them from His anger on the day of judgment, but the Hebrew word ’ulai (“it may be,” “perhaps”) points to the divine freedom to show mercy. Humans have no control (v. 3).

2:4–15

Geographical Oracles

Verses 2:4–15 contain oracles against the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, Ethiopians/Cushites, and Assyrians. The Philistines lived to the west of Israel (vv. 4–7), the Moabites and Ammonites to the east (vv. 8–11), the Ethiopians to the south (v. 12), and the Assyrians to the north (vv. 13–15). The Lord would punish them for their wickedness, including their hostility against Judah. As Creator, Yahweh rules over all nations and controls the whole world.

2:4–7. Philistia. The land of the Philistines consisted of five major cities, also called the Pentapolis: Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Ekron, and Gath (2:5; 1 Sam. 6:17). Here, as in Jeremiah 25:20, Gath is not mentioned, because it was destroyed earlier. The Cherethites/Kerethites, who originated from the island of Crete, inhabited the southern part of the Philistine seacoast (cf. 1 Sam. 30:14). God would desolate these cities and destroy the people living in them. Curiously, Zephaniah does not explain God’s judgment against the Philistines. But God had already stated the reason through the Prophet Amos: the Philistines ruthlessly took people captive and sold them to Edom (Amos 1:6). Therefore, the remnant of Judah would pasture their flocks in the desolated land of the Philistines.

2:8–12. Moab, Ammon, and Ethiopia. Moab and Ammon appear together in the book of Zephaniah because of their common origin and geographical proximity. Their history dated back to the time of Abraham and Lot. Moab and Ben-Ammi (i.e., Ammon) were the sons of Lot by his two daughters after God saved them from the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 19:36–38). The descendants of these brothers threatened the Israelites for many generations. About a century earlier, God had accused Ammon and Moab of cruelty (Amos 1:13; 2:1). He now condemned them for their reproaching insults, pride, and arrogant threats against His people, Judah, and swore to destroy them like He did Sodom and Gomorrah (Zeph. 2:8–9). These nations emerged out of the destruction of those very cities but failed to treat Israel, their brother, with mercy. Once again, Yahweh would give their lands to the remnant of Judah. He would destroy all the gods of the earth, leading to the true worship of the sovereign God. Even those from distant shores would join the remnant in worshiping Him (v. 11).

The Hebrew kushim (lit. “Cushites”), though sometimes translated “Ethiopians,” refers to the northeastern peoples of Africa in modern Sudan. God simply states that His sword would slay them too. He may have had a particular offense in mind, or He may have cited the most distant known nation to the south to show that His judgment would extend over the whole world.

2:13–15. Assyria. At the time of Zephaniah’s ministry (ca. 630–625 B.C.), Assyria posed the greatest threat to Judah. Its capital city, Nineveh, was destroyed by the Medes and the Babylonians in 612 B.C., but it was still strong during the time of Zephaniah’s ministry (ca. 630–625 B.C.). Nineveh consisted of an inner city surrounded by a wall eight miles (12.9 km) in circumference, plus an outer city, twelve hundred towers, and fourteen gates. Pronouncing the doom of this awesome and seemingly impregnable metropolis must have appeared a tall order and an enormous risk. But the Lord, using human instruments, would stretch out His hand and destroy Assyria (2:13). The desolation of the once proud city would leave it as dry as the wilderness. Passersby would hiss in ridicule and shake their fists in horror and amazement. Through Nahum, God accused Nineveh of idolatry, lies, robbery, harlotry, and sorcery (Nah. 1:14; 3:1–4). Zephaniah condemns this rejoicing, reveling city for pridefully considering itself greater than all others (Zeph. 2:15). In fulfillment of his prophecy, the Medes and the Babylonians destroyed Nineveh in 612 B.C. Indeed, pride goes before a fall.

3:1–20

JUDGMENT AND BLESSING

The final chapter begins with a reiteration of the judgment against Judah and the nations. It picks up the universal tone of 1:2–3 before concluding with promises of the restoration of the faithful into a glorious state of blessing.

The prophet condemns Jerusalem and its inhabitants for their flagrant sins and their persistent refusal to listen to the divine warnings. But God would not destroy His people completely. Yahweh, the jealous covenant-keeping God, would protect the faithful remnant and restore them to eternal joy and happiness.

3:1–7

Jerusalem Rebuked

Zephaniah proclaimed woe to Jerusalem because of obstinacy, impurity, and oppressiveness. In 3:2, the prophet summarizes their misdeeds with four negative sentences. Jerusalem refused to obey, accept correction, trust the Lord, or draw near to Him, all things God's chosen people should do. In vv. 3–4, God denounces the four leading social classes of that time: the princes/officials, the judges/rulers, the prophets, and the priests. He condemns them for their iniquity, injustice, impurity, idolatry, and violence to the law. The people of Judah and Jerusalem, both leaders and followers, knew no shame despite the Lord's unfailing faithfulness to His people (v. 5). Yahweh had punished them and other nations, which should have led them to fear Him and to accept His instructive correction. Yet their corruption persisted (v. 7). Judah had disregarded the righteous Lord among them and deserved destruction (v. 5).

3:8–13

Judgment upon All Nations and Restoration of the Remnant

In 3:8, Yahweh envisions the great day when He would arise in wrath and judgment in order to testify against all the inhabitants of the earth. The King and Judge of the world would gather the nations and assemble the kingdoms to punish them in His fierce anger. This universal judgment would devour all the earth, consuming it with the fire of His jealousy. The righteous, however, would join Isaiah in proclaiming that the Lord is Judge, Lawgiver, and King. He would save them (Is. 33:22).

In contrast to His roles as Judge and Lawgiver that are emphasized in Zephaniah 3:8, vv. 9–13 show Him as Savior and King. He would purify the lips/language of the peoples (cf. the cleansing of Isaiah's lips by one of the seraphim;

Is. 6:5–7). He would remove impure elements from Judah and the nations so that the faithful remnant might remain and call on the name of Yahweh, serving Him with one accord (Heb. shekem 'ekhad, “with one shoulder, shoulder to shoulder”; Zeph. 3:9). The meek, humble, and contrite remnant would seek to please Yahweh (v. 12). With no unrighteousness or lying among them, they would live in peace under Yahweh's care. No one would make them afraid (v. 13). What a blessed world after centuries of distress and disasters!

3:14–20

Redemption and Restoration

Zephaniah calls God's people to sing, shout, be glad, and rejoice because of Yahweh's past deeds (3:15a), His future deliverance (v. 17), and His very presence with them as their loving and gracious King (vv. 15–17). Verses 14–17 form a short, self-contained psalm with a chiasmic structure. Israel rejoicing over Yahweh's deliverance at the beginning corresponds to Yahweh's joy over their return to Him at the end. Yahweh would keep His covenant of love and mercy by preserving the remnant of Judah, an assurance that certainly calls for rejoicing on the part of the faithful.

In vv. 18–20, Yahweh repeats His promise to redeem and restore His people from exile and give them renown and honor among the nations. The use of several active verbs, the emphatic interjection “behold” (Heb. hinni, from hinneh, omitted in some translations; v. 19), and the final affirmation that Yahweh Himself had spoken (v. 20) combine to emphasize this as a proclamation of Yahweh's desire to fulfill His covenant promises through Israel. Yahweh spoke as the sovereign God of punishment for the wicked but also as the covenant-keeping God of redemption for His people.

The book of Zephaniah vividly describes the Day of the Lord as a day of destruction for the wicked but also as a day of redemption, restoration, and rewards for those who trust and follow the Lord until the end (Ps. 18:20; Is. 40:10; 62:11; Acts 3:20–21; Eph. 4:30; Heb. 11:6; Rev. 11:18). This is “the blessed hope” of God's people of all ages (Titus 2:13; Rom. 10:12; 1 Cor. 12:13; Gal. 3:7–9, 28; Col. 3:11). This eschatological Day of the Lord will bring the cosmic conflict to an end.

HAGGAI

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The name Haggai is based on the Hebrew khag (“festival”). The ending ai could be an abbreviation for yah-weh (“festival of the Lord”) or a personal pronoun (“my festival”). The Prophet Haggai’s name and ministry expressed hope and joy and aimed at energizing God’s people to fulfill His plan for them. The book of Ezra mentions Haggai (Ezra 5:1; 6:14), and Zechariah alludes to his work (Zech. 8:9), but no information exists about his ancestry, occupation, or age. The text gives the impression that he was a dynamic, young preacher.

The book gives no indication whether Haggai had remained in Judah or returned from exile, but it twice claims he was a prophet of the Lord (Hag. 1:3; 2:1). More than two dozen times, this prophet of new beginnings used the messenger formula and variants of it to affirm his message as divine communication (see 1:13; cf. 1:2–3, 12; 2:1, 10). He themed his oracles around the Exodus and saturated them with covenantal language.

Date. Haggai was the first of the postexilic prophets who ministered in Judah. Like other prophets, he provided specific dates for his messages (see also Ezek. 8:1; Dan. 1:1; 2:1; Zech. 1:7; Ezra 1:1; Neh. 1:1; 2:1). His prophetic activity spanned a period of a little more than three months, but the effects transcend millennia. He proclaimed his first message at the celebration of the new moon on August 29, 520 B.C. (Hag. 1:1) and his last oracle a couple of months later, on December 18, 520 B.C. (2:10, 20).

Backgrounds. During the early Persian period, Jerusalem was not the political center of the province. The governor of Judah lived in Mizpah, while the religious center continued to be in Jerusalem. The Neo-Babylonians had left Jerusalem in ruins after their short hegemony over the land (cf. Jer. 40:5–8). It no longer served as the political center of the province, though it continued as the religious center and as a place of pilgrimage (see Jer. 41:4–5). Archaeological evidence shows occupation among the ruins and in some parts of the city that did not suffer the full intensity of the Neo-Babylonian destruction.

While the kings of Babylon weakened and the kingdom slowly became ineffective, the Medes and the Persians gained strength. Cyrus arose from the obscure tribes of today’s southern Iran and began conquering kingdom after kingdom until he finally faced the Neo-Babylonians. When he entered the city of Babylon on October 12, 539 B.C., he did not meet serious resistance. Thus, Cyrus the Achaemenid, grandson of a Median king, consolidated an empire even larger than the one achieved by the Neo-Babylonians.

Ezra carefully documented the events that fulfilled Isaiah’s and Jeremiah’s prophecies (Ezra 1:1–4; cf. 2 Chr. 36:22–23; Is. 44:24–45:25; Jer. 29:10). Cyrus, “the anointed one” (Heb. mashiakh), ordered the rebuilding of the temple of the Lord (ca. 538 B.C.; see 2 Chr. 36:22–23; Is. 44:24–45:3), so batches of exiles returned to Judah to resettle Jerusalem (Ezra 1:11; 7:7). After Cyrus’s untimely death, his son Cambyses occupied the throne (530–522 B.C.). During his reign the reconstruction of the temple of Jerusalem stopped, due mainly to opposition from neighboring groups (Ezra 4:24). Cambyses’s rule ended unexpectedly when he died on his way back to Persia to fight a usurper, the so-called “Pseudo-Smerdis.”

Darius Hystaspes (522–486 B.C.) then rose to power. He was from the Achaemenid family, not a descendant of Cyrus II, the Great. He promoted and supported the rebuilding of temples that had been neglected or destroyed before his rule, and his propaganda stimulated the good will of temple administrators. His major contribution to the people of Judah came in 520 B.C. when he supported the reconstruction of the Jerusalem temple and the restoration of its services (Ezra 6).

COMMENTARY

1:1–11

An Apparently Hopeless Situation

Theology and Purpose. Haggai lived and preached hope in a time of hopelessness, during which those who had returned to Judah were stuck in survival mode.

1. Hope for the Hopeless. Because of their condition, the people focused only on satisfying their material needs. They had lost their kingdom and the land promised to them. Haggai called their attention to higher ground, to the covenantal promises that the Lord had made to their ancestors. He assured them that the promise made to Abram (see Gen. 15:13–14) and fulfilled in the Exodus from Egypt also applied to the exodus from Babylon. Haggai echoed Moses with prophetic authority directly from the Lord.

2. Faithfulness to the Covenant. Haggai succinctly summarizes the blessings and curses uttered at the dawn of Moses's ministry. He challenges his audience in a covenantal lawsuit that moves them to react as the Israelites had a millennium earlier. His oracles are a condensed version of Deuteronomy but strengthened with far-reaching promises of hope. In order to completely fulfill the promised deliverance, the Lord needed a sanctuary so He could dwell among His people to direct, protect, and atone for them. The forgiveness and cleansing of the nation came through the sacrifices. The temple would please the Lord by providing a place of hope for God's people to praise Him, and its services would point to the atoning work of the coming Davidic King, the Messiah.

3. Messianic Hope. Haggai's vision of the Messiah's rule and the submission of the nations to the Lord in His temple transcends the pitiful reality of his time and motivates all believers to fulfill the plans of the Almighty and hope for the fulfillment of the covenant.

Literary Features. The book of Haggai communicates its message using a simple, direct style and energetic tone mixed with rhetorical questions (Hag. 1:4, 9; 2:3, 12–13, 19), key phrases (1:5, 7), parallelism (1:4, 6, 9–10), and allusions (cf. Gen. 46:3; Ex. 3:12; Deut. 28:22–24, 38–40; Josh. 1:9; Is. 7:14). The book follows a chronological order formed by four parallel oracles. Oracles one (1:1–11; Aug. 29; followed by a response from the people, 1:12–15; Sept. 21) and three (2:10–19; Dec. 18) charge the audience with their failures, while the second (vv. 1–9; Oct. 17) and fourth (vv. 20–23; Dec. 18) promise hope to the people.

The experience of the new exodus from exile was not what the returnees expected. Unlike their ancestors' glorious deliverance from Egypt (ca. 1447 B.C.), no signs or wonders signaled their departure from Babylon. The hopes of a present-day kingdom ruled by the promised Messiah had crumbled under the weight of the Persian Empire, and they had lost their original enthusiasm to rebuild the house of the Lord. Haggai 1:1–11 rebukes the people for their failure to rebuild the symbol of God's presence among them. According to the prophet, the economic crisis they faced resulted from their unfaithfulness to the covenant.

1:1. Introduction. During the exodus from Babylon, God had not visibly displayed His divine power but had exhibited His silent presence among His people. But the word from the Lord that Haggai received interrupted the apparent divine silence, arriving precisely when the people needed it. Haggai dates his oracle to the second year of King Darius of Persia, on the first day of the sixth month (i.e., August 29, 520 B.C.; 1:1), a festival day to celebrate the new moon (cf. Num. 10:10; 28:11; 2 Kin. 4:23; Ps. 81:3).

For the first time, a prophet of Yahweh did not mention a Hebrew king as a point of reference for his ministry. They had no king when Haggai dated the messages, so he had to refer to King Darius instead. This serves as a gloomy reminder of Judah's colonial status and the degenerate times in which the prophet lived. Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, though a descendant of David, was only a governor (Ezra 3:2; Neh. 12:1; cf. Ezra 2:2; Zech. 4:6; Matt. 1:12; Luke 3:27). The chronicler identifies Zerubbabel as the son of Pedaiah (1 Chr. 3:17–19). Some connect him with Sheshbazzar, governor of Judah in Ezra (Ezra 1:5–11; 5:14). Regardless, he was clearly a descendant of Jehoiachin (2 Kin. 24:15; 1 Chr. 3:17) and a rightful candidate for the throne of Judah.

Joshua the son of Jehozadak (also Jozadak), the high priest, was a descendant of Aaron (1 Chr. 5:1–15). He emerged as a capable spiritual leader, listening to the words of the prophet. The Prophet Haggai is mentioned without pedigree or renowned ancestry. But as the Lord's prophet, he spoke with as much authority as the prophets during the monarchy. The phrase dabar yahweh (lit. “the word of Yahweh”) first appears in Genesis 15:1 to describe God’s revelation to Abram. It later became a common description of a divine and authoritative communication. This “word” calls us to celebrate and to hope.

1:2–4. Their Place in the Journey. The prophet introduces his message by invoking yahweh tseba’ot (“Lord of hosts/armies, Lord Almighty”; 1:2), a name that emphasizes the rule of Yahweh, the covenantal God of Israel, over all armies and nations. The Lord controls human affairs (cf. Dan. 4:34–35), but by not finishing the rebuilding of the temple, His people actually denied His presence among them. Joshua and Zerubbabel had laid the foundations of the temple two years after arriving in Jerusalem (Ezra 3:8–10), but almost twenty years later, they had not finished construction. Because of God’s perceived absence, the people focused on their own survival and not on restoring religious structure.

The contrast between what the people said and what the Lord said could imply a covenantal lawsuit (cf. Ex. 33:12–13; Is. 1:18; 43:26; Hos. 4:1; 12:2; Mic. 6:2). The Lord accused the people of obstructing His work through indifference, neglect, and mistaken priorities. Haggai avoids discussing sociopolitical explanations for the delay, like opposition from enemies (Ezra 4:5) or a lack of resources. The people did not oppose rebuilding the temple; they simply concluded that the time had not yet come (Hag. 1:2). Meanwhile they lived in sepunim (“paneled,” “roofed”) houses, not luxurious mansions but houses with roofs, in contrast to a temple in ruins. The book of Haggai, along with archaeological findings, indicates that Judah was a poor province during the time of Haggai.

1:5–11. Considering the Past. Before the Israelites entered the promised land, Moses reminded them of the Exodus and invited them to reflect on their past experiences. Haggai used a similar approach, calling the people to consider their ways and how their covenant violations had caused a deep ecological and economic crisis (vv. 5–7; 2:15–18; Deut. 28:15; 38–39, 48; cf. Lev. 26:20). No matter how much they sowed and planted, they harvested only a little (see also Mic. 6:14–15; cf. Hag. 2:15–19).

Despite having clothing, the Israelites could not stay warm (1:6). Sheep and goats need nourishment to produce healthy wool and hair. Perhaps scarcity of green pasture affected their production.

Without water there was not enough linen, so no one was warm due to lack of sufficient clothing materials. Even their small leather bags rotted and broke apart, letting their wages fall to the ground. While most transactions at the time were in kind, the people of Judah may have used Samaritan, Philisto-Arabian, or Phoenician coins for taxes, commerce with foreigners, or wages.

Reflections on the past must lead to positive actions in the present. The Lord commanded the people to go up to the mountains to collect wood and to build the temple for His pleasure and glory (v. 8). The rebuilt temple would bring Him honor. The command did not necessarily require the people to seek timber from Lebanon, an unlikely task given their tense relationship with their neighbors. More likely they went to the surrounding hills of the Judean highlands to find trees for scaffolding to support the stone structure and roofing of the temple. Because of their proximity to a quarry of high-quality stone, they needed only wood to finish the work.

The Lord explained that He had caused the people’s dire situation because they had left His house in ruins while preoccupied with their own houses (v. 9). God took responsibility for the drought and the scorching desert winds that brought about the covenant curses, including lack of grain, wine, and oil (v. 11). In an agrarian society, climate changes can mean the difference between prosperity and starvation, especially in the highlands, where irrigation requires terraces and cisterns to maximize the use of the rain. The Judean hill country needs the seasonal rains affected by the atmospheric pressure and winds coming from the sea (see Lev. 26:4; Deut. 28:12). That area has only two seasons: the dry season and the rainy season. Most of the year, moisture coming from the Mediterranean Sea falls as dew before condensing over the hill country. The Lord sent the dew from the heavens (cf. Gen. 27:28; Deut. 33:28; Zech. 8:12), so Judah’s only hope for survival was to rebuild His house.

1:12–15

The People’s Response

In response, the people obeyed the voice of the Lord their God as the ancient Israelites at the feet of Mount Sinai had sworn a thousand years earlier (1:12; cf. Ex. 19:8). The passage concludes by describing how the Lord stirred up the spirit of each group that constituted the Lord’s community—the civic establishment, the religious leaders, and the rest of the people (Hag. 1:14). Their answer must have been unanimous.

This time everyone supported the prophet, making Haggai one of the most successful prophets in terms of community response.

Zerubbabel, Joshua, and the rest of the people obeyed the voice of the Lord (v. 12). Haggai does not differentiate between the returnees and the ones who had remained in Judah. The she'erit ("remnant," "rest") included all those affected by the experience of the Exile. Through them the Lord would fulfill His purpose. Moses had warned the Israelites about the possibility of exile (Deut. 28:36, 41, 63-68), the ultimate curse, but he also promised that the Lord their God would bring them back from captivity and have compassion on them (Deut. 30:3). The restoration of the community fulfilled this promise. As the Lord's messenger, Haggai offered the people hope and promised them God's presence (Hag. 1:13; cf. Deut. 7:21, Josh. 1:9; Ps. 23:4; Is. 43:2). Like the official messenger of the Persian Empire, he had access to the "Great King."

God's action rallied His people to action (cf. 2 Chr. 36:22-23; Ezra 1:1-4; Is. 41:2, 25; Zech. 4:6-10; Phil. 2:13). Energized by God, they cut trees for the scaffolding, removed stones, and cleared the site. Several weeks later, on the twenty-fourth day of the sixth month in the second year of King Darius (September 21, 520 B.C.; Hag. 1:15), the people began to build the temple in Jerusalem. The temple provided an unquestionable symbol of the covenant and a clear evidence of hope.

2:1-9

Hope and the Temple

Haggai presented his second message at the climax of the Festival of Tabernacles. The twenty-first of the month (Oct. 17, 520 B.C.) was the final day of the celebrations. He addressed a discouraged people who felt that the reconstructed temple did not compare to the magnificent temple of Solomon. He rejected their attitude and reminded them of the covenant the Lord established when they came out of Egypt (2:5). They needed to be strong. This passage climaxes with the announcement of the coming of the Desire of all nations.

2:1-3. Faded Glory. The Festival of Tabernacles, celebrated in the seventh month (known as Tishri), reminded the people of their experience during the wilderness wanderings (see Lev. 23:33-44; cf. Num. 29:12-40; Deut. 16:13-15). The religious calendar climaxed on the twenty-first of the month, a time of feasting and celebrating the harvest. But in the time of Haggai, the harvest was sparse, leaving little to celebrate. Hopelessness had disheartened the builders (see Ezra 3:12), so Haggai delivered a message from the Lord. He asked the people if any among them had seen the temple in its former glory, a rhetorical question since few of them would have been alive when the Babylonians destroyed Solomon's temple in 586 B.C. But even though it looked less impressive, the glory of the temple did not come from the gold and silver that once decorated it but from the presence of the Lord in His house of worship (see Hag. 2:7).

2:4-5. Covenant and Promise. The book of Haggai uses the Exodus as a type of the return from Babylon. God reminded the people that He had acted according to the covenant He made with them when they came out of Egypt (v. 5). He promised redemption to humanity (Gen. 3:15), reassured Abram of it (Gen. 12, 15, 22), formalized it with the Israelites (Ex. 19-20; cf. 34:10; 1 Kin. 8:9), and guaranteed it to David (2 Sam. 7:1-16). God is faithful to His word. The prophet echoed Moses's words to Joshua son of Nun when he encouraged Zerubbabel, Joshua son of Jehozadak, and the people of the land to be strong (Hag. 2:4; Deut. 31:7; Josh. 1:6-7, 9, 18). He uses the Hebrew verb hazaq ("be strong") three times to highlight the need for effort in the task at hand (cf. Zech. 8:9, 13). But success would come from the Lord, whose Spirit remained among them (see commentary on Hag. 1:12-15). The divine presence would cast out their fear of the nations and provide them with hope that was grounded in the presence of God with His people.

2:6-9. Future Glory. The Lord promised to shake the heavens and the earth, the sea and the dry land, just like He did in Egypt during the Exodus (see Heb. 12:26-29). In ancient Near Eastern literature, the deities demonstrate their power through earthquakes, eclipses, and storms. The Lord established His authority using imagery familiar to His people (cf. Judg. 5:4; Joel 2:10-11; Amos 9:1). God's rule over the natural and political worlds would shake all the nations, as the people of Judah had witnessed through the edicts of Cyrus and Darius to rebuild the temple. In a little while, God would again intervene directly in history, shaking all nations by the manifestation of His power and leading them to the Desire of all nations.

Although Haggai lifted the spirits of the people with the assurance that silver and gold belong to the Lord, his main concern was not economic prosperity but the restoration of the glory of God. After the shame of the Exile, the Lord would restore His honor and glory in the new temple. Even though Haggai encouraged the rebuilding of a physical temple, it merely served as a symbol of God's sanctifying presence among His people. And the presence of the Messiah would bring greater glory to this temple (see Mal. 3:1). In fact, He would take the functions of the earthly temple on Himself (John 2:19).

2:10–19

The Lives of Committed Believers

Before asking the Israelites to build the sanctuary, the Lord gave them the Decalogue and laws concerning purity and holiness. On the twenty-fourth day of the ninth month in the second year of Darius (December 18, 520 B.C.), several weeks after beginning the rebuilding of the temple, God instructed His people how to live in faithfulness to the covenant (2:10). Haggai explained the importance of holiness and the need to avoid defilement (vv. 10–14). But he also reminded them of God's power to turn the curse into a blessing (vv. 15–19; see Deut. 28:1–14). The “early rains” had recently arrived in the month of October and its abundance promised a plentiful harvest, reenergizing Judah's hope.

2:10–14. Holiness and Defilement. The prophet's words demonstrated the people's need for cleansing. Moses had instructed the people concerning holiness as a prerequisite for approaching the Lord (Lev. 17–26). The priests were responsible for instructing the people on such matters (see Deut. 17:8–13; Ezek. 44:23–24; Mal. 2:1–7), and Haggai affirmed that function of the priesthood. He reminded them that although uncleanness is transferable through

The Desire of All Nations

For centuries Jewish and Christian interpreters supported the rendering “desire” for the Hebrew khemdah, which made “desire of all nations” a treasured messianic title (Hag. 2:7). However, modern translators have questioned and mostly abandoned that reading, preferring to render khemdah as “wealth.” Linguistically, both translations are possible, but the context supports the traditional translation.

1. Syntax of the Verse. The verb “they shall come” is third-person plural, while the noun khemdah is feminine singular. For khemdah to be the subject of the sentence, it would have to agree with the verb in number. The only way to translate the phrase without changing the text would be “they [the nations] will come to the desire of all nations.” The subject of the verb is the nations mentioned in the first part of v. 7, and the noun “desire” functions as the object of the verb.

2. A Theophany. Haggai 2:6–7 describes a theophany that would shake nature and the nations. They would witness a powerful manifestation of the Lord that would create a new order. Confronted by this majestic power, the nations would come to the Messiah to seek refuge. Verses 21–23 also describe the shaking of nature and the nations in reference to the coming Messiah. The passage emphasizes the glory of God. The people perceived the glory of the new temple to be inferior to that of the temple of Solomon (v. 3), but the prophet immediately corrected this false perception. The glory of the temple did not stem from external appearance (v. 9) but from the presence of God within it (vv. 4–6). The power of this glory would completely fill the temple (v. 7) and would spill over the earth and the nations, shaking them up. In that temple, the nations would find the Desire of all nations, making it more glorious than the previous one (v. 9). The silver and the gold did not matter because it all belongs to the Lord (v. 8).

3. Use of khemdah. The word khemdah has a variety of uses, including references to Israelite kings. At the beginning of the monarchy, “the desire of Israel” was on Saul as the appointed king (1 Sam. 9:20). The people did not desire an evil king (2 Chr. 21:20). Therefore, Haggai logically identifies the Messiah as the Desire of all nations, including Israel.

touch, holiness is not (Lev. 22:4; Num. 19:22). Touching a dead body would make a person unclean and would contaminate anything else the unclean person touched, including offerings. To enjoy the coming of the Desire of all nations, they needed to cleanse their hearts and turn to the Lord (Hag. 2:17).

2:15–19. Blessings Strengthen Hope. The people needed radical change. Haggai reminded them that when they expected twenty units of grain, they reaped only ten, and when they expected fifty liquid units from the winepress, they received only twenty. The Lord had struck the work of their hands (the fields) with blight (scorching desert winds from the east), mildew (humid winds from the west), and hail in fulfillment of the covenantal curses (see Deut. 28:22; Amos 4:9). Through this experience, the Lord wanted them to understand their spiritual condition and turn to Him, but they had not. So He would now do something different. He would show them kindness even though they did not deserve it. He would bless them (Hag. 2:19). Love turns people around. Yes, they needed to be reminded to seek the Lord, but His mercy would change their hearts.

2:20–23

Present Promises and Future Hopes

The imagery in Haggai's last message—chariots overthrown, horses and riders hurled down, heaven and earth shaken—again recalls the Exodus (see Ex. 14:23–25). He looked at the past, applied it to the present, and then pointed to the future and God's final work of deliverance, the awaited Messiah, the Hope of His people.

2:20–22. The Shaking. In the new exodus, the Lord would shake heaven and earth. This global event looks beyond the conflicts faced by Darius to the establishment of the kingdom of the Lord (cf. Dan. 2:44). The apocalyptic language describes the climax of the cosmic conflict, when God would overcome all the kingdoms of the earth. As in Haggai 2:7, the shaking of the nations not only pertains to the temple but to the role of the Messiah as Judge and Savior.

2:23. The Signet. Zerubbabel was a governor (v. 21), a title highlighting his status as a vassal of Persia (see commentary on 1:1). But the Lord also identified him as His “servant,” a title used for David and for the Messiah (Is. 42:1; 49:5–7; 52:13–53:12). Zerubbabel seems to function as a type of the Messiah. In this eschatological context, the signet (Heb. khotam) symbolizes God's redemptive power and the reversal of earlier curses. Haggai must have had in mind Jeremiah's warning to Coniah (Jehoiachin) that even if he were the last king of Judah, the khotam in the Lord's hand, God would nevertheless pluck him off (Jer. 22:24–30). But now the Lord would reverse the curse, making Zerubbabel, who was never a king, like a signet ring, a type of the One who would come as the khotam of the Lord. The Lord rejected Coniah as a symbol of the Davidic monarchy but would make Zerubbabel a symbol of the Messiah. The book of Haggai closes with a look forward—a hope grounded in the experience and expectations of the remnant of Judah.

ZECHARIAH

INTRODUCTION

Title and Authorship. The Hebrew title of the book, zekaryah, means “Yahweh remembers.” The author names himself four times but provides little personal information (Zech. 1:1, 7; 7:1, 8). He is also mentioned in Ezra 5:1 and 6:14 and probably Nehemiah 12:16. Several others in the Bible bear this name (Ezra 8:11, 13, 16; 10:26; Neh. 11:4–5, 12; 12:35, 41).

Zechariah was the son of Berechiah/Bere-kiah and the grandson of Iddo, but we know no more of his father and grandfather than of him. The title “prophet” probably refers to Zechariah himself, not his grandfather (Zech. 1:1, 7). The Berechiah mentioned in Nehemiah, seven decades later, could not have been Zechariah’s father (see Neh. 3:4, 30; 6:18). Since Zechariah’s ministry began less than twenty years after the Jews returned from exile, he was probably born in Babylon and returned to Judah with Zerub-babel in 536 B.C. If Nehemiah 12:16 refers to the prophet, then he was a priest.

Some scholars argue that chapters 9–14 come from a different author than the one who wrote chapters 1–8. The two sections do have differences in form and content, but there is no concrete evidence to determine how long Zechariah’s ministry lasted. He could have written chapters 9–14 later, when concerns about the temple were no longer pressing. The content of the latter chapters does not necessarily reflect a different author.

Date. Zechariah contains three dates. He received his call “in the eighth month of the second year of Darius” (1:1). Darius’s second regnal year began in the spring of 520 B.C. and the eighth month fell in the autumn. Thus Zechariah’s ministry began about November 520 B.C. He saw the visions “on the twenty-fourth day of the eleventh month...in the second year of Darius” (1:7). All eight of Zechariah’s visions probably occurred on the same night or within a short interval during the winter of 519 B.C. Consequently, Zechariah heard from the Lord again “in the fourth year of King Darius...on the fourth day of the ninth month” (7:1). This date, near the end of 518 B.C., probably applies to chapters 7 and 8. Chapters 9 through 14 are not dated. Since they differ somewhat in subject, vocabulary, and style, Zechariah may have composed them later in his ministry.

Backgrounds. Zechariah’s prophecies addressed the situation of the Jewish people shortly after their return from Babylon (for the historical background, see Haggai: Introduction). The first part of the book (chaps. 1–8) deals with the immediate issues concerning the returning exiles: resettling the people, rebuilding the temple, and reestablishing sacrificial worship and annual festivals. The second part (chaps. 9–14) deals with the postexilic community’s future concerns: relations with neighboring nations, messianic expectations, and eschatology.

Theology and Purpose. The central theme of the book of Zechariah is the restoration of God’s people (Israel and Judah) following captivity. The divine promises to Israel and Judah foreshadow the eschatological restoration of God’s people throughout the earth.

1. Restoration and Salvation. The book of Zechariah announces the restoration of land (14:10–11), cities and towns (1:17), people (8:4–8), temple (6:12–13), and priesthood (3:1–7). Zechariah calls the people to abandon their prior sins, which led to the Exile (7:8–14), and to return not only to the land (10:6–10) but to a proper relationship with God (1:3). He assures them of God’s promises to return to them (8:3). His presence would fill the rebuilt temple (1:16), and He would forgive their sins (3:9; 13:1), restore the land, deliver them from their enemies (12:2–13:1), and provide them with the hope of a glorious future that would extend to all humanity (14:6–11). God will restore not only Judah to its promised earthly homeland but all humanity to their Edenic home. The nations will turn to God (2:11; 8:22–23) and worship Him in Jerusalem (14:16). In this regard, Zechariah's message parallels that of the Bible as a whole.

The Scriptures tell how God placed humanity in a perfect home. But because of sin, they lost this home and face-to-face communication with their Creator, who exiled them into a hostile world to suffer the consequences of their misdeeds. Nevertheless, God showed them kindness by bringing them back into communion with Him and promising them a glorious eternal future in which they and their world would be consecrated to Him. Zechariah tells the same story. When exiled to Babylon, the people of God lost their home in the promised land and the privilege of close communication with God in the temple. But in His love, God forgave their sins and brought them back to their land, where the temple was rebuilt and the priesthood was reestablished. And there, through the ministry of Zechariah, God assured His people of His presence and promised them a glorious future.

In this way, the book of Zechariah communicates an overarching message of Scripture. It does not deal merely with some small aspects of God's workings with His people in antiquity but presents a microcosm of the entire plan of salvation. Judah's exile and restoration represent, in miniature, the story of humanity from paradise lost to paradise restored. Thus, Zechariah offers both a present historical hope for the people of Judah and a future eschatological hope for all nations.

2. The Coming King. In his description of the promises of restoration, Zechariah refers to a coming King and Agent of restoration called the "Angel of the Lord," the "Branch," and the "Shepherd." In the OT, the Angel of the Lord is often identified as Yahweh but is sometimes presented as a divine being distinct from Yahweh (e.g., Gen. 16:11–12; 31:11–13; Ex. 3:4, 7–18; 14:19, 24; Judg. 6:11–25). Similarly, the book of Zechariah both distinguishes between the Angel and Yahweh and presents the two as divine persons (e.g., 3:1–2, 6–9; cf. 1:8–12; 12:8). Again, in Zechariah we have the promise of Yahweh to send His "Servant the Branch," through whom the guilt of the land will be removed (3:8–9; 6:12). This is the coming King whose kingly and priestly roles are symbolized by Joshua and Zerubbabel, the kingly role being further presented through the shepherd metaphor—the "Shepherd" (the Lord's close associate) who would be betrayed and stricken for His people (cf. 11:12–13; 12:10; 13:7–9). He would combine the kingly and priestly roles symbolized by Zerubbabel, the governor, and Joshua, the high priest. The descriptions in Zechariah recall the promise of a divine Branch who would reign on the Davidic throne in everlasting peace and righteousness (Is. 7:14; 9:6; 11:1–16; Jer. 23:5–6; 33:14–18; Dan. 7:13; 9:25–27; Mic. 5:2) and whose suffering and death would bring healing to humanity (see Is. 52–53). The book anchors the hope of God's people in this Messiah, who would come to Zion riding on a donkey, bringing salvation and joy (Zech. 9:9).

Literary Features. The book of Zechariah uses three distinct literary forms, forming the three major sections of the book. Apart from the introduction and appeal for repentance in Zechariah 1:1–6, it contains a series of vision reports (1:7–6:8) that ends with a command for a symbolic act (6:9–15), a prophetic inquiry (chaps. 7–8), and two prophetic oracles (chaps. 9–11; 12–14).

The form of the vision reports resembles those in the book of Daniel. Both present the supernatural revelation in symbolic terms, explained by an angelic interpreter. The angel may explain only the historical significance of the symbols or may expand on the spiritual implications with appeals to repentance and declarations of encouragement.

The prophetic inquiry in chapters 7–8 resembles some of the inquiries found in preexilic biblical books (see 2 Kin. 22:11–20; 1 Chr. 17:1–15; Jer. 21:1–14). In each case, someone (often a messenger) comes to the prophet with a question about some contemplated course of action. The prophet then gives an answer from God. The answer, often more complex than the question, not only specifies God's will on the matter but also includes messages of warning or encouragement that spell out the practical implications of proceeding.

The prophetic oracles of Zechariah 9–14 resemble the national oracles in many of the preexilic prophets that announced God's judgments against various nations (cf. Jer. 46–51; Amos 1:3–2:16). Zechariah formally directs the two oracles against "the land of Hadrach" (Syria; Zech. 9:1) and against Israel (12:1), though he also mentions several other nations.

Certain sections of Zechariah contain characteristics of apocalyptic literature, which normally involves symbolic visions, interpretations by angelic messengers, and messages of deliverance for God's people and judgment against other nations. The apocalyptic character of the book is most evident in the first and third sections, which discuss God's plan to restore not only the postexilic Jewish community but also the entire world.

COMMENTARY

1:1–6

INTRODUCTION

The introduction dates the beginning of Zechariah's prophecies to the second year of Darius (i.e., 520 B.C.). The eighth month of the Jewish calendar would overlap October and November. Like many other prophets, Zechariah asserted the authority of his message by claiming to speak "the word of the LORD" (1:1). All the major sections of the book of Zechariah also begin with some indication of the divine origin and authority of the message (v. 7; 7:1; 9:1). The call to repentance begins with a statement of God's anger. Because of the actions of their forebears, Judah had experienced difficulties since the Exile. Their ancestors refused to listen to the prophets (1:4). But the Lord's command to return to Him (i.e., repent; v. 3) offers the solution for the sin of disobedience.

Even after the prophets died, the potent words they spoke on the Lord's behalf came to pass and eventually led those who went into exile to confess that the Lord had treated them as their deeds deserved (v. 6). The people of Judah needed to learn from what happened to their ancestors and to act differently. After all, even their forbearers eventually returned to God and repented when they were exiled.

1:7–6:15

THE NIGHT VISIONS

Each of Zechariah's eight visions follows a similar literary pattern: the prophet describes what he saw in his own words and requests an interpretation, which an angel provides. In several cases, the interpreting angel adds an oracular statement that emphasizes the significance of the vision. The visions assured the postexilic Jewish community of God's protection as they built the temple and restored worship of the Lord.

1:7–17. The First Vision. Zechariah gives a more precise date for his vision than for his call (cf. 1:1)—around February 15, 519 B.C. The prophet affirms the message as "the word of the LORD" even though he himself describes the vision. He presumably saw all the visions on the same day since he gives no other date. He wakes up in 4:1, suggesting he may have slept between the visions.

The prophet saw a man riding on a red horse standing among the myrtle trees (1:8). This was probably the Angel of the Lord (v. 11), not the angel who talked with Zechariah (v. 9). The designation "man" probably refers only to appearance since this messenger disclosed supernatural information. Scripture often identifies the Angel of the Lord as Yahweh but sometimes presents Him as a divine being distinct from Yahweh (cf. Gen. 16:11–12; 31:11–13; Ex. 3:4, 7–18; 14:19, 24; Judg. 6:11–25). Details such as the colors of the horses are not significant in any discernable way, and the text does not interpret them. But the series of four colored horses recalls the similar vision in Revelation 6:1–8. Symbolic horses show up again in Zechariah's eighth vision (Zech. 6:1–8) and in the latter half of the book (see 9:10; 10:3).

The horses had roamed throughout the earth and returned to inform the Angel of the Lord that everything was quiet, peaceful, at rest, and still (1:11). This could mean that the Persian Empire, including Judah, was under no threat, so the Jews could proceed to reconstruct the temple without fear. The promises of vv. 16–17 would support this interpretation. But it could also indicate that the nations around Judah were not assisting the Jews and remained hostile, an interpretation supported by the rebuke against the nations in v. 15. It seems that while Judah struggled, other nations enjoyed ease and did not care about Judah's welfare. In either case, God clearly wanted the Jews to rebuild the temple.

The Angel of the Lord responded to the message with a complaint that reflected the thoughts of the people. Although the world was at rest, Judah had still not received relief (v. 12). Apparently, the return of the small remnant did not completely fulfill the prophecies of restoration (cf. Jer. 29:10; 24:6–7). They also had to restore the city and temple. The seventy years (Zech. 1:12) may refer to the years of captivity predicted by Jeremiah (Jer. 25:11–12), from 605 to 536 B.C., or to the seventy years extending from the beginning of Nebuchadnezzar's final siege of Jerusalem to the year of Zechariah's visions, from 589/8 to 519 B.C.

Concerning the response of God to the angel, we are only told that He spoke tobim ("good," “pleasant,” “kind,”) and nikhumim (“comforting,” “compassionate”) words (v. 13). Whatever He said, He intended to encourage. Though He had been a little angry with Judah, He could not accept how the nations had treated them. Judah had not done what the Lord wanted, but their enemies had overdone what He wanted. God’s anger against Judah (v. 2) had turned into extreme jealousy/zeal for Jerusalem and Zion and anger against the complacent nations (vv. 14–15).

In his vision, Zechariah explains that God had returned to Jerusalem with mercy and compassion. As a sign of His mercy, the Lord would secure the rebuilding of His house, symbolized by the line (of the surveyor or builder) stretched out over it. He would reinstate His past mercies by comforting Zion, choosing Jerusalem, and causing the cities to overflow again (v. 17).

1:18–21. The Second Vision. In the Bible, horns symbolize power and pride (cf. Deut. 33:17; Ps. 75:4–5; Dan. 8:3–9). Here, the horns which had scattered Judah, Israel, Jerusalem, and the nations that lifted up horns represent those who opposed the Jews (Zech. 1:19, 21). But craftsmen would oppose the horns by frightening them and throwing them down. The Hebrew word kharashim (“craftspersons,” “carpenters,” “metalworkers”) can refer to any type of skilled worker but often indicates those who produce religious objects (see Is. 40:19; Hos. 13:2), including those who built the sanctuary (Ex. 38:23) and Solomon’s temple (1 Kin. 7:14). Here, the “craftspersons” are those building and furnishing the temple. Thus, rebuilding the temple would repel Judah’s enemies.

2:1–13. The Third Vision. The “measuring line” in 2:1 translates a different Hebrew term from the one used in 1:16, but both are instruments for architectural measurement used to measure Jerusalem. In Zechariah’s time, they had not yet rebuilt the wall, so the man could not have measured Jerusalem’s walls. But the act of measuring Jerusalem implies that the city would have a specific size. Two angels explained this vision and the two implications for Jerusalem of the absence of a wall. First, a wall would not limit the city because of its great size and population (2:4). Second, the Lord would protect the city and be the glory inside it, making a wall unnecessary. In some sense, the wall is the glory of a city and not its fortifications. God would not only surround the city to protect it but be present within it as well (i.e., in the temple). The repetition of the verb ‘ehyeh (“I will be”) seems to imply two different but complementary roles for God. The Hebrew says literally “I will be a wall...and I will be for glory” (v. 5). Zechariah did not see either of these predictions fully realized. Nearly a century later, in the time of Nehemiah, the city was still underpopulated. Not until the time of Jesus did it overflow during festivals.

A poetic explanation follows the vision. The Lord repeatedly exhorted the exiles to flee from the land of the north (i.e., from Babylon; v. 6; cf. Jer. 25:9; Ezek. 26:7) and to escape from the daughter of Babylon (Zech. 2:7). They no longer needed to cringe in Babylon. God assumed responsibility for the punishment and restoration of Judah: He had scattered them abroad to the four winds (v. 6), so they could safely return when He called them back.

Verses 8 and 9 offer additional reasons to return. God watches over Judah as the apple of His eye (v. 8). The “apple” of the eye is either the eyeball or the pupil. In either case, this is a very sensitive, easily seen body part. God was very aware of and sensitive to any offense against Judah. The Jews also needed to return because God would soon punish the nations in which they were exiled. It was no longer safe to remain in Mesopotamia. This confirms the message that Zechariah received in the first vision: either all was at peace (and it was safe to return to Judah), or the hostile nations would be punished (and it was unsafe to remain there). The fulfillment of Zechariah’s prediction would prove to the people that God (yahweh tseba’ot, “LORD of hosts, LORD Almighty”) Himself had sent Zechariah (v. 9). Unfortunately, most of the Jewish exiles never returned despite these assurances.

Two seemingly paradoxical exhortations bracket the latter part of the oracle, one to shout, sing, rejoice, and be glad because God was coming to live among them (v. 10) and another to be silent because the Lord had aroused Himself from His holy dwelling (v. 13; cf. Hab. 2:20). But the first exhortation is addressed to the daughter of Zion and the latter is addressed to all flesh/human beings. It was time for Zion to rejoice and for the rest of humanity to hold its tongue in awe because the Lord would inherit and take possession of Judah. In response, the nations had to join with the Lord (Zech. 2:11) or else face destruction (14:3, 12). Then they would know that God had indeed sent Zechariah (2:11). Thus, both the affliction of the nations and their conversion appear as signs of the truthfulness of Zechariah’s message. The idea of foreigners joining with Judah recurs in 8:20–23.

3:1–10. The Fourth Vision. The next two visions address the two leaders of the Jewish community, a pivotal issue in this part of the book. The fourth vision centers on Joshua, the first high priest after the return from Babylon (see Ezra 3:2, 8; 4:3; 5:2; 10:18; Hag. 1:1, 12; 2:2, 4), and his fitness to serve. The high priest represented the people before God. Bringing Judah and the world back into order necessitated two things: the temple and the priesthood. But both had been out of commission for nearly sixty years, and only appropriately consecrated priests could renew the temple and minister in it.

In his vision, Zechariah saw a courtroom scene: Joshua stood before the Angel of the Lord with Satan at the right to oppose/accuse him. The verb “oppose” or “accuse” derives from the same Hebrew root as the name “Satan.” The prospect of Judah’s restoration aroused challenges from the opponents of God’s people (Ezra 4:4–16; cf. Neh. 4:1–11), here epitomized by the Accuser (i.e., Satan). He based his objections on the sinfulness of the people both before and after the Exile. Strangely, however, instead of Satan rebuking Joshua, the Lord rebukes Satan. Although Joshua stands before the Angel of the Lord (Zech. 3:1), the Lord Himself speaks in his defense. Here, again, the divine Angel of the Lord is distinguished from Yahweh (see commentary on 1:7–17). In such contexts, the Angel most probably refers to the Messiah (3:1–9; cf. Ex. 14:19; 23:20–21; Mal. 3:1–3).

God Himself had grounds for accusing the people of Judah and sending them into exile. But now He had again chosen Jerusalem (Zech. 3:2; cf. 1:17; 2:12). Since God had chosen Jerusalem, the restoration of the city constituted a rebuke of Judah’s enemies, including Satan. The brand rescued from the fire refers not only to the high priest Joshua but also to all of postexilic Judah. The high priest represents the people whom God had taken back from the “fire” of exile and reinstated in their holy calling.

Zechariah saw Joshua dressed in dirty clothes, representing the iniquity of Joshua and the people he represented. The defiled garments and his personal iniquity would make him unfit for his priestly functions. This presented a vicious dilemma: Joshua could not officiate because of his defilement. He could be cleansed only through a sacrifice, but he was the priest who had to offer the sacrifice to remove the defilement. Divine intervention solved Joshua’s problem. God ordered Joshua’s filthy garments removed and replaced them with clean garments that would enable him to serve in his capacity as high priest. He does not deny Joshua’s defilement. He takes it away. Joshua’s transformation symbolizes what God would do for Judah and for every person who turns to Him. By taking the side of repentant sinners, God continues to remove the iniquity of those who cannot rescue themselves.

In the vision, a series of assurances follows the change of Joshua’s clothes. First, God would assure Joshua’s position if he would remain obedient, walking in the Lord’s ways (moral conformity to God’s will) and keeping the Lord’s charge (faithful performance of ritual duties). If he would do these things, Joshua would have a share in Judah’s restoration and a place among the heavenly beings present in this scene (3:7).

Second, God assured Joshua that He would send His Servant, the Branch (v. 8). “The Branch” is a messianic title (cf. Jer. 23:5–6; Is. 4:2; see Zechariah: Introduction). Zechariah 6:12 indicates that the Branch would build the temple. Though Zerubbabel rebuilt the temple (4:6–10), he was not the Messiah. Rather, as the sanctuary builder, he symbolized the coming Messiah, who would inaugurate a new sanctuary, as indeed Jesus did (Heb. 8:1–2; 9:11).

Third, God assured Joshua that He would remove the iniquity of the land (Zech. 3:9). The text does not explain the stone with seven eyes placed before Joshua. Commentators have variously associated the stone with Christ, the kingdom of God (cf. Dan. 2:34–35, 44), and Zerubbabel, though none of these has been conclusively established. Since the promise of the coming Servant, the Branch, immediately precedes (Zech. 3:8), the stone may refer to the Messiah (Is. 28:16), who would come to remove iniquity (Zech. 3:9; cf. Is. 53:4–5), and the seven eyes may refer to the Holy Spirit, who accompanies and endues the Servant (cf. Is. 11:1–2; 42:1; 48:16). Elsewhere in Scripture, Revelation 5:6 mentions seven eyes, which are “the seven Spirits of God.” Understood differently, “seven eyes” may refer to seven facets on the stone, though a seven-sided stone would be unusual. Since God would engrave an inscription on the stone, it likely had some commemorative purpose. Some have suggested that the stone was a cornerstone, but a cornerstone with seven sides would seem impractical. The word translated as “eyes” could also mean “water springs” or “fountains,” and the expression mepattekh pittukhah (usually rendered as “I will engrave an engraving”) could instead mean “I will open its openings.” If this is correct, it would fit with the final clause of the verse, which refers to the removal of the iniquity/sin of the land in one day (Zech. 3:9), especially in view of the promise in 13:1. The idea of removing iniquity in one day probably refers to the Day of Atonement and fits well with the high priest's change of clothes on that day (Lev. 16).

Fourth, the Lord assured Joshua that after the cleansing the inhabitants of the land would dwell at peace. This also fits the Day of Atonement because after the cleansing the inhabitants of the land would dwell at peace. Zechariah 3:10 points to times of peace and prosperity when the people of Judah would invite their neighbors under their vine and fig trees (cf. 1 Kin. 4:25; Mic. 4:4).

4:1-14. The Fifth Vision. In his fifth vision, Zechariah saw a lampstand resembling those in the tabernacle and Solomon's temple. Zechariah's description of the seven lamps probably means that each of them had seven lips, or notches, to hold wicks. This single fixture would then have forty-nine flames on it, making the lamp very bright. The bowl on top may have contained oil for the lamps, though this is not specified. Unable to understand the vision or the function of the two olive trees, the prophet asked about it, but he did not receive an immediate answer (v. 4).

Before answering the prophet's question, the angel provided a spiritual interpretation: the Spirit of the Lord, not human activity, would fulfill the vision. This certainly provided hope to a people whose limited numbers and resources made the tasks at hand quite daunting. The first few visions represented God's decision to scatter Judah. But now God's power had reassembled them and purified Joshua. Here, the message encourages Zerubbabel, the governor of the postexilic community. The Spirit of God would accomplish great things, leveling obstacles that seemed like mountains before him (v. 7), and he would have the honor of placing the capstone on the completed temple.

Fifteen years after the exiles had returned from Babylon, they had still not restored the temple, the very reason for returning. Zerubbabel, who was probably already old, might have doubted whether he could complete the reconstruction. But the angel assured him that this would happen. Like the punishment of the nations (2:9) and their future conversion (v. 11), the completion of the temple would show that God had truly appointed Zechariah. Some may have despised "the day of small things" because of its seeming insignificance (4:10). Others would weep seeing how the new temple paled in comparison to Solomon's temple (cf. Ezra 3:12-13; Hag. 2:3). But the prophets viewed this meager building as a sign of God's intervention and the promise of greater glory to come (cf. Hag. 2:7). The seven may refer to the seven lamps with seven pipes representing God's presence on the earth (cf. Rev. 4:5; 5:6), to the seven eyes of the Lord, or possibly to those who despise "the day of small things" (Zech. 4:10). The combination of the words eben and bedil in v. 10 are somewhat obscure. Conjectural translations include "plumb line" and "chosen capstone," the last stone put in place.

The angel finally answers Zechariah's question from v. 4. The seven lamps represent the eyes of the Lord, which scan back and forth through the whole earth (see Rev. 4:5). The two olive trees/branches and the two gold pipes are the two anointed ones who stand beside the Lord, serving the Sovereign of the whole earth (Zech. 4:14). As high priest, Joshua would have been anointed (cf. Ex. 28:41), and the previous vision had already depicted him standing before the Angel of the Lord (Zech. 3:1). Zerubbabel, as a descendant of David, would also have been eligible for such a rite (see 1 Sam. 9:15-16; 16:1-3). Similarly, Revelation 11:3-4 refers to two olive trees and two lampstands standing before the God of the earth.

The word tsanterot, usually translated as "pipes" (Zech. 4:12), does not appear elsewhere in Scripture. The symbol of the trees is not perfectly clear. Although the two anointed leaders did not have the power to reestablish Judah, they served as intermediate sources of God's power. The lampstand itself appears to represent the community, which God empowers to become "the light of the world" (Matt. 5:14). Despite the obscurity of some of the description, Zechariah 4:13-14 clearly explains the point of the vision: God's power would accomplish what Judah needed.

5:1-4. The Sixth Vision. In his sixth vision, Zechariah saw a scroll of normal length but abnormal width. Normal scrolls were much smaller than 10 cubits (15 ft or 4.6 m) wide. The size indicates the importance of the message written on it. The flying scroll must have been unrolled (and therefore readable). Zechariah did not see the content of the scroll, but the interpreting angel told him that the scroll contained the curse going out over the face of the whole earth/land (5:3). One side of the scroll announced the expulsion of thieves, the other the expulsion of perjurers. It does not mention idolatry, the sin the preexilic prophets most commonly denounced.

After the Exile, polytheism was rare among the Jews. Like the words of God, the curse worked without human agents (see also Ps. 147:15; Is. 55:11). Since the scroll and its curse would destroy the homes of thieves and perjurers, no place would remain for them among the returned exiles (Zech. 5:4). The fourth vision provided for the purification of the nation, and the sixth provided for the removal of those persisting in sin.

5:5–11. The Seventh Vision. While the sixth vision denounced sin, the seventh describes its removal. An 'epah was either a fiber basket or a clay jar used to measure about 20 liters of grain (5.3 gal). A normal 'epah could not hold an adult, so the basket, like the scroll in the previous vision, must have been oversized and, therefore, symbolic. Its occupant symbolizes wickedness. She apparently attempts to leave the 'epah, but the angel throws her back in. The heavy lid prevents the woman from reopening the 'epah and escaping.

The removal of the 'epah to Shinar (i.e., Babylon) describes the process of Judah's purification, accomplished by the seventy-year Exile, which destroyed most of the nation and scattered most of those left (cf. Ezek. 5). Of those scattered, a few faithful ones returned home, leaving behind the idolatry of previous generations. Spiritual problems, but not idolatry, remained after the Exile. Throughout the Scriptures, Babylon symbolizes evil, even when God uses it as an instrument of punishment (as in Jer. 25:9 ff.).

The Hebrew name for the stork (khasidah; Zech. 5:9) derives from the adjective meaning "faithful," so "faithful ones" removed wickedness from Judah and took it to a land representing enmity toward God. They would build a house/temple for the 'epah and permanently install it in wicked Babylon. Wickedness would no longer have a place among God's people; this is possibly connected to the removal of sin from Israel on the Day of Atonement.

6:1–8. The Eighth Vision. The eighth vision reprises the first, except that Zechariah saw chariot horses instead of riding mounts. Again the colors remain unexplained, as do the mountains of bronze (which could represent God's dwelling place; 6:1; cf. 8:3). The angel does explain that the chariots represent "four spirits of heaven." The Hebrew word rukhot can mean either "winds" or "spirits." The meaning "winds" (as in Dan. 8:8) would perhaps imply their destinations (the four directions), but the fact that they stand before the Lord of all the earth allows for "spirits" (i.e., angels) as a possible translation (Zech. 6:5). The angel sent two of the chariots to the north (i.e., Mesopotamia) and one to the south (i.e., Egypt). However, some translations render the destination of the white horses as "west" rather than the more literal "after them" (i.e., north, following the black horses). The angel did not give the chariot of the red horses a destination but sent the chariots to travel throughout the earth, patrolling the nations (v. 7).

Those going toward the north gave God's Spirit rest in that region (v. 8). This differs slightly from the first vision, in which the whole earth rested quietly (1:11), but both represent peace. Assyria and Babylon always invaded Judah from the north, so the mention of rest in the north assured God's people that these invaders would not return. The postexilic community no longer needed to worry about the dangers around them (cf. Hag. 1:2). The rest for God's Spirit may refer to Darius's decree permitting the rebuilding of the temple (cf. Ezra 6:1–12). The night visions ended as they began, on a hopeful note. The whole earth was at rest, including Judah (Zech. 1:11; 2:12; 12:1–14). Even the Lord had found rest in the restoration of His people and temple.

6:9–15. The High Priest's Crown. At this point the book shifts from vision reports to an oracle commanding symbolic action. The exiles who had come from Babylon had perhaps brought the silver and gold as an offering for the temple from the Jews remaining in Mesopotamia, as Sheshbazzar had twenty years earlier (cf. Ezra 1:1–11). Since the Branch is a messianic title, this entire passage could prophesy the coming of the Messiah (see Zech. 3:8). More likely, it presents either Zerubbabel or Joshua as a historical type of the Messiah. Zerubbabel, the first governor of the postexilic Jewish community, was a descendant of King David, a "branch" from the Davidic line. He led the rebuilding of the temple (6:12). Both Matthew and Luke identify Zerubbabel as an ancestor of Jesus (cf. Matt. 1:12–13; Luke 3:27). But the Lord told Zechariah to crown Joshua the high priest, not Zerubbabel, the Davidic scion. The Hebrew word 'atarot is plural, though many translations render it as "crown" rather than "crowns." The text indicates that Joshua was to receive both crowns. However, the command for Joshua to behold the Man named the Branch implies that Joshua should look for another messianic figure (Zech. 6:12). The crowns foreshadow the dual role of the Messiah as both priest and king (cf. Heb.

3:1; Rev. 17:14; 19:11–16). Jesus fulfilled these prophecies, for He is King (cf. Luke 19:37–38; John 18:37–39; Rev. 19:11–16), Priest (Heb. 3:1; 9:11), and the Provider of a new temple (John 2:19–21; Heb. 8:1–2; Rev. 21:22).

The crowns would remain in the temple as a memorial for those who would come from afar to rebuild it, drawing their attention not to individuals but to the temple's whole reconciliatory function (Zech. 6:14–15). Though worn by the high priest, the crowns honored the temple and the Lord. The assistance of distant people in reconstructing the Lord's temple would serve as a fourth sign that the Lord had sent Zechariah (v. 15, cf. 2:9, 11; 4:9).

7:1—8:23

QUESTIONS ABOUT RELIGIOUS PRACTICE

Chapters seven and eight form the third section of the book, containing Zechariah's response to an inquiry. Other prophetic books also contain such responses (cf. Jer. 21:1–2; Ezek. 20:1). These two chapters form an inclusio in which the end of Zechariah 8 echoes the beginning of chapter 7. The question (7:1–3) receives an extended answer (7:5–8:23) centered around an appeal to restore social justice and a promise of material restoration (7:8–8:17), which leads to the encouraging note within the direct response eventually granted to the inquiry (8:18–23).

7:1–7. Inquiry about Fasting. Two years after the visions of Zechariah 1–6, during the winter of Darius' fourth year (around December 7, 518 B.C.), Zechariah received an inquiry about fasting. By this time, the people had resumed work on the temple, as indicated by the presence of the priests in the house of the Lord (7:3), though they did not complete reconstruction until about March 12, 515 B.C. (cf. Ezra 6:15). Zechariah 7:2–7 describes the messengers sent to make an inquiry, but different translations understand the Hebrew betel ("house of God") in different ways. It could mean the place of Jacob's encounter with God (Gen. 28:19), the temple itself, or the city. In any case, they came to inquire concerning a traditional day of fasting on the ninth day of the fifth month that commemorated the destruction of the temple by the Babylonians in 586 B.C. Since the fast commemorated the Exile, which had ended, and the destruction of the temple, which was being rebuilt, they wondered whether they should still observe it. They asked this question in the ninth month, eight months before the next observation of the fast. This was not a spur-of-the-moment question; the enquirers wanted to know how their religious life should change after the return from exile.

Zechariah responded with the divine authority of the word of God (Zech. 7:4). But first he challenged the inquirers' sincerity. They fasted and feasted, motivated by personal concerns rather than a real interest in the Lord. They had ignored His instructions given by the prophets. God did not command the fast in question. It was merely a human ordinance. The other fast in the seventh month (Tishri) commemorated the murder of Gedaliah. The seventy years in v. 5 refers to the period from the destruction of Jerusalem in 587/6 B.C. until this inquiry in 518/7 B.C., seventy years by inclusive reckoning.

7:8–14. A Call to Justice. The Lord has always desired social and economic justice over meaningless rituals (see Is. 58:1–12; Mic. 6:6–8). It is therefore no surprise that God responded to an inquiry about fasting by calling for His people to practice justice and mercy and to stop oppressing the weak and plotting evil against each other (Zech. 7:9–10; see also Deut. 27:19; Is. 1:16–17; Jer. 7:5–7). The four commands mentioned—two positive (practice justice and show mercy) and two negative (do not oppress the widows and orphans or plan evil; Zech. 7:9–10)—were intended to change the way worshipers related to their fellow beings. This, rather than external ceremonies, is the essence of true religion (cf. Prov. 21:3; James 1:27). Such justice was particularly commanded toward widows, orphans, aliens, and other marginalized people (Zech. 7:10). God has expected the same behavior of humanity in all ages (cf. Matt. 23:23). When His people had obstinately refused to listen to His message, as communicated through the prophets, God had treated them the same way, refusing to listen to them when they called (Zech. 7:11–13). Finally, He scattered them with a whirlwind, the inevitable consequence of their own behavior (v. 14).

8:1–8. The Promise of Restoration. God did not desire the Exile, and the curse that followed was not His final word. God always wanted to bless His people, and when they were ready to receive blessings, He granted them abundantly. God promised to dwell again in the city (i.e., to sanctify it) and to repopulate it with His people, whom He would save from the east and the west (8:3-8). The “east” may refer to Persia, but the “west” is less identifiable. Instead, east and west may represent all directions. God plans to do the same again in the last days by bringing His people from all nations (cf. Rev. 5:9) and all directions (Luke 13:29).

8:9-15. The Promise of Prosperity. For God to restore Judah, giving them a place in the city again, the people needed to give Him a place again by rebuilding the temple. The Lord had refused to listen to those who did not listen to Him. But now He would bring Judah back to dwell in Jerusalem, and they would provide a temple for Him to dwell in among with them. The repeated exhortation to “let your hands be strong” (8:9, 13) parallels the instructions Haggai gave to Zerubbabel and Joshua, leaders of the postexilic community (cf. Hag. 2:4-5). The words of the prophets seem to refer to the preaching of Haggai, the only other prophet around this time (Zech. 8:9).

The people had previously neglected the work of rebuilding the temple. As a result, poverty, harassment, and conflict characterized the nation (v. 10; Hag. 1:3-9). Both Zechariah 7:14 and 8:10 mention God punishing His people by means of human choices and actions. Through free choice and providence, He both allowed and arranged circumstances under which He knew the nations would ravage Judah and turn against their neighbors. But now God promised to reverse Judah’s desperate situation, including changes in both the natural and the social worlds. God would make the land fertile and send rain to the fields (see Deut. 7:13; 28:4; Hag. 2:18). He promised to restore both Judah and Israel, all twelve tribes (Zech. 8:13; cf. 10:6-7; Jer. 50:17-20). In return, He required Judah to both rebuild the temple and reestablish socio-economic justice (Zech. 8:16-17).

8:18-23. The Response to the Inquiry. Until this point, Zechariah had given no answer to the question about fasting. But Judah’s response to the Lord’s appeals would elicit a natural change in their fasting. Just as true worship and justice would replace the preexilic sins, so festivals would replace fasting. The fast on the seventeenth day of the fourth month (Tammuz) commemorated the breaching of Jerusalem’s defensive wall during the last siege (2 Kin. 25:3-4). The fast on the ninth day of the fifth month (Ab) commemorated the destruction of the temple (2 Kin. 25:8-9). The fast on the third day of the seventh month (Tishri) commemorated the assassination of Gedaliah

(2 Kin. 25:22-26), and the fast on the tenth day of the tenth month (Tevet) commemorated the beginning of the final siege of Jerusalem (2 Kin. 25:1). But they would all become festival days.

The rebuilding of the temple would reverse the improper worship so common before the Exile, and justice would replace preexilic injustices. So the return of the exiles would also reverse the scattering of Judah. People from other nations would seek to join them in worshiping the Lord (cf. Is. 60:3-22). Zechariah had earlier announced God’s judgment against the nations (Zech. 1:15, 21; 2:8-9), but now he foretells their attachment to His people (8:22-23; cf. 2:11). Zechariah predicted this future ingathering of foreign nations would join the ingathering of Judah that was already happening (8:9, 15).

9:1—14:21

COMING JUDGMENT AND DELIVERANCE

Zechariah 9 begins the last major section of the book. It contains two prophetic sermons (9:1—11:17; 12:1—14:21) that form a continuous, integrated message arranged as a chiasm:

- A God’s Acts in History, Giving Victory to Zion (9:1-17)
- B God’s People Restored (10:1—11:3)
- C Leaders Appointed (11:4-17)
- B’ God’s People Reformed (12:1—13:9)
- A’ God’s Acts to Culminate History on the Day of the Lord (14:1-21)

9:1—11:17

The First Prophetic Sermon

Both prophetic sermons are called massa’ of the word of the Lord. The prophets used the Hebrew word massa’ (9:1; 12:1) two dozen times to refer to an oracle from God, but it does not occur in the earlier sections of Zechariah. This final section of the book appears less systematic than the earlier parts, leading some commentators to suppose that it comes from a different writer. But the hypothesis is unnecessary since we do not know how long Zechariah remained active as a prophet. He possibly wrote various parts of the book at widely separated times, resulting in differences of topic and style.

9:1-8. The Punishment of the Coastal Peoples. The first part of Zechariah 9 announces the Lord's judgment regarding Judah's neighbors. The cities mentioned were north of Judah, either in Syria (Damascus and Hadrach) or near the Syrian border (Hamath). Zechariah does not describe any particular sins of these Syrian cities or specify any particular punishments. Some translate the Hebrew preposition be, used in v. 1 before the land of Hadrach and possibly implied before Hamath in v. 2, as "against." However, it is unclear whether this prophecy condemned or commended. Either way, the eyes of all people (including the tribes of Israel) had turned to the Lord (vv. 1-2).

Tyre and Sidon, both located north of Jerusalem, were the principal surviving Phoenician cities. Several prophets pronounced oracles against these cities (see Is. 23:1-18; Ezek. 26-28; Joel 3:4-5; Amos 1:9-10). The word matsor ("tower," "stronghold," "fortress") in Zechariah 9:3 refers to fortified defensive constructions built in the time of King Hiram. The people of Tyre took great pride in these defenses, and God's judgment came against them precisely because of this pride (Is. 23:8-9).

Ashkelon, Gaza, Ekron, and Ashdod were four of the five cities of the Philistine confederacy located southwest of Jerusalem along the Mediterranean coast (the text omits Gath; see Jer. 47:1-7; Amos 1:6-8; Zeph. 2:4-7). Zechariah foresaw these cities becoming dependencies of Judah, without a king and inhabited by a mixed population (Zech. 9:5-6). Ironically, around this time Judah itself had no king, depended on the Persian Empire, and struggled with problems of ethnic and religious diversity. Despite the antagonism between Judah and Philistia, Zechariah predicted the conversion of a remnant of the Philistines, who would integrate into the covenant community, each becoming an 'allup ("leader," "chief," "clan") in Judah (v. 7). The comparison of Ekron with a Jebusite recalls David's conquest of Jerusalem when the Jebusites were not destroyed but integrated into David's kingdom.

9:9-17. The Triumph of Zion. In contrast to the Philistine's lost king, Judah's king would come (v. 9), initiate an era of peace (v. 10a), and reign over a vast realm. No one between Zechariah and Jesus even remotely resembles the career of this coming King. Zechariah certainly did not expect Zerubbabel to exercise worldwide dominion (v. 10). He expected the coming Messiah, Jesus Christ, a descendant of Zerubbabel (Matt. 1:12-13; Luke 3:27), fulfilled the general terms of this prophecy. Jesus's triumphal entry into Jerusalem fulfilled the prophecy that Judah's King would come riding on a donkey (Matt. 21:1-7; John 12:12-15). Although the military commonly used horses, both judges and kings rode donkeys and mules (see Judg. 10:4; 1 Kin. 1:33). Though "lowly" (Zech. 9:9), this King would exercise global authority with justice and power, and He and His people would promote peace (v. 10; cf. Is. 9:6-7; Matt. 5:9; Eph. 2:13-17; Heb. 12:14). The expressions bat tsiyyon and bat yerushalam, literally "daughter [of] Zion" and "daughter [of] Jerusalem," are personifications or poetic terms for the city and/or its inhabitants.

In another postexilic reversal of fortune, the prisoners would return from their places of captivity. The waterless pit (Zech. 9:11) may metaphorically refer to the arid climate of Mesopotamia. Captives hoping for God's deliverance (lit. "prisoners of hope"; i.e., "hopeful prisoners") would return to the stronghold/fortress, presumably Jerusalem, whose fortifications at the time were not impressive. However, God, their true stronghold, had promised to be a wall of fire around Jerusalem (2:5). The text does not explain the nature of the double restoration promised in 9:12, which may relate to the double blessing given to the firstborn (cf. Gen. 48:15), but clearly their final condition would surpass their former state.

The military imagery of Zechariah 9:13-15 does not propose that the Jews went to war but rather identifies the returning Jews as the weapons of the Warrior God. In the past God had used the pagan nations as instruments against His disobedient people (cf. Is. 5:24-28; 10:5-6; Jer. 5:15-17; 25:8-9; Hab. 1:5-6). After this, God would use these returning exiles to accomplish His will in a resistant world.

The Lord would punish Judah's neighboring enemies (Zech. 9:1-8), provide Judah with a king (v. 9), establish peace (v. 10), release their imprisoned compatriots (vv. 11-12), and arm Himself with the returning exiles (v. 13). Finally, He would assure their safety (vv. 14-16) and prosperity (v. 17). God Himself would advance as a Warrior to defend His people (vv. 14-15) and display them as His special treasure, a mark of His presence (v. 16). The beauty and goodness Zechariah praises is possibly God's, and he also praises His land (v. 17). As in Zechariah 8:12, God promises the bounty of the earth: grain and new wine (9:17).

10:1—11:3. Restoration of Judah and Ephraim. Canaanite religion associated rainfall with the activities of Baal. Before the Exile, pagan influences had often led the people of Judah into this belief as well. However, the prophets insisted that the Lord, not the Canaanite gods, made the farms and flocks fertile. Zechariah reasserts the teaching of the earlier prophets: idols deceive but the Lord would provide the rain (10:1–2). The “rain” contrasts with the “waterless pit” (9:11). The latter/spring rain fell around February or March, bringing grain crops to maturity.

Zechariah reprises the shepherd metaphor, commonly used in the Torah and the Prophets to describe a national leader (see Num. 27:17; Ezek. 34:1–12). Some passages portray the shepherds positively and some negatively. Zechariah uses the metaphor both ways. At the beginning of chapter 10, Judah either lacks a shepherd (v. 2) or has shepherds who displease the Lord (v. 3). The Hebrew verb paqad (“visit,” “attend to,” “care for”) has both positive (see Gen. 50:24–25) and negative connotations (see Ex. 32:24). In this case, Zechariah uses it to express God’s care for His people, Judah. The Lord threatened to punish the shepherds and ’attudim (“leaders,” lit. “male goats”; Zech. 10:3–4). These may have been Judeans rather than foreigners, but Zechariah portrays the Lord as warring against foreign enemies, resulting in the restoration of His people. Judah would be His flock and His royal, valiant warhorse (v.3; cf. 9:13).

For Zechariah 10:5, some translators supply the object “enemies” after the verb for treading down/trampling. Other translators, however, indicate that Judah would tramp through muddy streets to fulfill of God’s commission. This is the first indication that Judah would join the fight. But their victory would depend on God’s presence with them.

God promises to rescue not only Judah but also Joseph and Ephraim (vv. 6–7); that is, the Northern Kingdom of Israel, exiled nearly a century and a half before the captivity of the Southern Kingdom of Judah. In contrast to the promises to Judah, which emphasize leadership (the shepherds) for the nation and their victory, the promises to Ephraim focus on their return. The Lord would willingly restore the northern tribes, just like those of the south. Sadly, few of the exiles from the Northern Kingdom responded to God’s call.

The Lord makes several promises to Ephraim. He would zara’ (“sow,” “scatter”) them among the peoples, where they would remember Him. Then He would gather them, and they would return with their children. They would survive and their numbers would increase (vv. 8–9). God foretells good for Judah and Israel, not evil.

God promises twice to return the exiles from both Egypt and Assyria (vv. 10–11), conveying the wide scope of the message. Zechariah himself had not returned from either of these nations. He returned from Babylon (at that time part of the Persian Empire). Most of the exiles in Egypt had gone there voluntarily at the time of Jeremiah (cf. Jer. 41–43), and the exiles in Assyria were from Israel, not Judah, and had been taken there many years before Nebuchadnezzar began deporting the people of Judah to Babylon. The scope of the message conveyed by Zechariah is very wide, not concerned only with the exiles from Judah in Babylon but also with God gathering all the tribes of Israel, whether they had been scattered forcibly or voluntarily, and adding to them non-Israelite nations (Zech. 8:22–23). The returning exiles would reenact the Exodus, passing through the sea and the dried-up river (cf. Ex. 14:21–15:22; Josh. 3:10–17).

In chapter 11 Zechariah again addresses Judah’s neighbors, Lebanon to the north and Bashan to the east. In Scripture, forests and trees, especially the cedar, symbolize pride (cf. Is. 2:12–13; Ezek. 31:3–5). The destruction of their forests may symbolize the fall of the nations themselves or of their leaders. The shepherds in Zechariah 11:3 probably refer to the leaders of the nations.

After the poetic portion that ends with v. 3, only two other short passages in Zechariah contain poetry (v. 17 and 13:7–9).

11:4–17. Good and Evil Shepherds. A reference to wailing shepherds in Zechariah 11:3 brings the discussion back to Judah’s leaders. If this part of the prophecy refers to specific historical persons and events, it is the least transparent part of the book. The two staffs and three shepherds are not easily identifiable. The prophet writes as though he is actually acting out the prophecy as the Lord commands him. Since the flock (v. 4) probably refers to the inhabitants of the land of Judah (v. 6) rather than to an actual flock of sheep, the scene is symbolic, like the manufacture of the high priest’s crown in 6:9–15.

The Lord commanded the prophet to feed the “flock” intended for slaughter (11:4), implying that the flock was destined for slaughter even before the prophet became responsible for it. The owners exploited the flock, and its shepherds did not pity them (v. 5). Further, the Lord warned Zechariah that he would not succeed in rescuing the flock, for even God Himself would no longer pity the people (v. 6). Despite God's warnings, Zechariah accepted his appointment and became a good shepherd, or at least an obedient one. He fed the flock, giving special attention to the poor, and selected two staffs for his work as a shepherd, symbolically named no 'am ("Grace," "Favor," "Beauty") and khobelim ("Bonds," "Union," "Harmony"; v. 7). He does not identify the three dismissed shepherds or clarify the reason for the mutual hatred between himself and them—possibly based on their disdain for the flock or, according to some translations, on the enmity with the flock itself (v. 8). The frustrated prophet finally left those of the flock who were dying to perish and those remaining to eat each other (v. 9). Like the Lord in v. 6, the shepherd abandoned the flock to the consequences of their chosen way. He broke the first staff, which represented the covenant he had made with all people (v. 10). This seems to represent the prophet terminating connections between himself and the nations, perhaps represented by the false shepherds and the flock.

Zechariah then broke the second staff, ending the bond between Judah and Israel (v. 14). Of course, Israel had not existed as a nation for about two centuries at this point. Previous chapters foretell the restoration of the people of the Northern Kingdom (cf. 9:13; 10:6-8), so it is not clear why Zechariah announced that the alliance between Israel and Judah would not prevail. He seems to indicate that such prophecies were conditional. In the rest of the book, he speaks about only Judah.

Finally, the prophet asked for payment for the services he rendered as a shepherd, and he received thirty shekels. This acted-out prophecy predicts God's rejected prophet, the Messiah, who would give His life for the people. To this service, they would assign an estimated value of thirty shekels (Matt. 27:9-10).

It is not entirely clear how the foolish shepherd of Zechariah 11:15-17 differs from his predecessor in vv. 4-9, except that the rejected shepherd seems more responsible than the cruel shepherd. The former shepherd let the "dying die" and the "perishing perish" (v. 9). His successor would not care for the dying, young, ill, or healthy of the flock and would go further by exploiting the flock (v. 16). Zechariah curses both the shepherd's action (his arm) and his perception (his right eye; v. 17). Because the flock had not accepted the shepherd appointed by the Lord, they would end up with a cruel shepherd under whom they would fare even worse. They would suffer because of their own wrongdoing. If we assume that "the flock" refers to Judah, this passage leaves the nation in a perilous state, deprived of God's pity and led by a worthless shepherd (vv. 6, 17). Judah had experienced this situation in exile, when they gravely needed the divine deliverance described in the second prophetic sermon (chaps. 12-14).

12:1—14:21

The Second Prophetic Sermon

12:1-9. Jerusalem's Rescue. Zechariah's second massa' ("burden," "oracle," "prophecy") concerns Israel (i.e., the people of God residing in Judah; 12:1). In it he denounces all the nations of the earth who gather against Judah and Jerusalem (vv. 2-3). The prophecy contains words of hope intended to encourage the people, both historically and eschatologically. Therefore, the Hebrew preposition 'al in v. 1 probably means "concerning" rather than "against." The passage communicates God's promise to protect Judah and Jerusalem.

This oracle often uses the imagery of war. As in 9:13, which describes Judah as a weapon in God's hands, Zechariah here prophesies that Judah would become an instrument capable of impeding or injuring the nations opposing it—a heavy, massive stone/immovable rock (12:3) and a cup causing drunken reeling/staggering (v. 2). "That day" refers to the time when God would punish His enemies, purify His people, and perform wonders (v. 3; cf. v. 8; 13:1-2; 14:4, 6). In the Hebrew, this expression (bayyom hahu') occurs five times in chapters 1-11 but seventeen times in chapters 12-14, indicating a shift in Zechariah's focus from his own era to the eschaton.

The Lord's promise addresses the 'alupe, a term sometimes rendered as "clans" and sometimes as "governors," "leaders," or "chieftains" (12:5-6). During this time Judah had no king, leaving royal appointees, like Zerubbabel, as the highest political officials. Whether leaders or clans, the 'alupe would consume/devour all the surrounding peoples on the right and left (v. 6). Since "right" and "left" in Hebrew can equally mean "south" and "north," respectively, this may refer to the nearby nations mentioned in 9:1-7, to the more remote superpowers in Egypt and Mesopotamia (10:10-11), or most probably to all of Judah's enemies. Like a flaming torch among sheaves, Judah would completely destroy their enemies. Again, Judah's own strength would not accomplish this, but God would assure their protection and destroy all the nations coming against Jerusalem (12:9; cf. 4:6). The promises of deliverance not only extend to Jerusalem but also to the rural areas, the dwelling tents of Judah, where seminomadic shepherds moved from season to season. God promised that the glory/honor of Jerusalem would not exceed that of the less developed areas (12:7).

12:10–14. Jerusalem's Mourning. Zechariah foresaw not only material restoration for Judah but spiritual restoration as well. The same God who would defend them and cause them to rebuild their city and temple would also give them a spirit of grace and supplication (v. 10). They would not rejoice over the destruction of their enemies. Instead they would mourn as a parent mourns for an only child or a first-born son. But they would not mourn because of their own material losses but because of the God they pierced (v. 10). Christian interpreters usually take this as a reference to the crucifixion of Jesus, when the only begotten Son of God was pierced on the cross for the sins of humanity. The listing of various families and clans who would mourn implies that God's people would mourn both universally and individually over their offenses against Him (vv. 12–14; cf. Matt. 24:30; Rev. 1:7). This passage contains several similarities with the messianic prophecy of Isaiah 52:13–53:12.

13:1–9. Spiritual Reformation. In response to Judah mourning over their offenses, a “fountain” would open in Jerusalem to deal with sin and uncleanness. Zechariah 13:1 does not state who would open this fountain, but v. 2 specifies that the Lord Himself would remove the names of the idols as well as the prophets and the unclean spirits (cf. 1 Kin. 22:22). The “names of the idols” signifies calling upon idols to invoke their help, and their removal means that the people would commit themselves exclusively to the Lord. The Lord does not explain the reason for the removal of the prophets, but Zechariah 13:4 hints that some people dressed in hairy garb resembling that of prophets in order to deliver false messages. In fact, all references to prophets in chapter 13 are negative. The prophets God would remove were likely those He had not commissioned. Not only would God remove the prophets, but their own families would reject and kill them (v. 3). These prophets would deny any pretention to prophetic function, no longer wishing to be identified as prophets (vv. 5–6). They would explain away their wounds, possibly associated with prophetic ecstasy, as injuries suffered in “the house of my friends” (v. 6; cf. 1 Kin. 18:28). Some consider the reference to the wounds as a messianic prophecy announcing the sufferings of Christ during the crucifixion (see Zechariah: Introduction; Matt. 27:26; Mark 14:65).

Zechariah 13:7 returns to the image of the shepherd that is used eight times in chapters 10–11. The text does not explain the striking of the shepherd and the scattering of the people, nor does it identify the shepherd. But he is clearly an agent of God, who calls him His companion, someone close to Him, and His associate. Jesus quoted this verse to predict that His disciples would abandon Him at His arrest (Matt. 26:31). Some translations capitalize the words “Man” and “Shepherd,” considering them divine titles referring to Christ. The death of two-thirds of the flock does not correspond precisely to any historical event in the time of Zechariah or in the ministry of Christ (cf. Matt. 26:31; Mark 14:27). But the proportions are not necessarily mathematically precise. The ratio of two-thirds to one-third means that most would be cut off. But God would bring the remaining third through the fire to refine them (Zech. 13:9). This refining process would result in their attachment to the Lord. He would call them His people, and they would call Him their God. In this way, He would purify the mourners and prepare them for the Day of the Lord.

14:1–21. The Day of the Lord. For the first time in the book, Zechariah 14:1 introduces the concept of the Day of the Lord. Eight of the other prophets also use this expression, usually to describe a day when the Lord would act on behalf of His people to correct wrongs and to establish justice. Christian interpretations often associate it with the return of Christ since the prophecy of Chapter 14 was never fulfilled in Judah. Its eschatological character suggests that its fulfillment may not follow the specific details mentioned in this chapter. The concept of the Day of the Lord in the Hebrew Bible includes the gathering of not only God's people but also His enemies for a final confrontation between good and evil (v. 2; cf. Joel 3:1–2). Zechariah depicts it in menacing terms, including the capture and looting of Jerusalem, the rape of its women, and the captivity of half of its survivors (Zech. 14:1–2). He predicts a time not of ease and delight but of conflict, calamity, and cataclysm, though not utter destruction. God would spare His people. He would not karat (“cut off,” “remove”) the remaining remnant from the city (v. 2).

In the eschatological conflict, the forces of evil would have their moment. But in the end God Himself would fight against them and defeat them (vv. 3, 5). The presence of the Lord and supernatural changes in the earth are essential elements of the concept of the Day of the Lord. In Zechariah's description, this includes the transformation of not only the land (v. 4) but also changes in the celestial realm (vv. 6–7). Enemies would capture Jerusalem (v. 2), but God would provide an escape by dividing the steep Mount of Olives (a north–south ridge) from east to west, creating a very large valley by which the inhabitants of Jerusalem could flee (vv. 4–5). The kedoshim (“holy ones,” “saints”) mentioned in v. 5 could be humans (cf. Deut. 33:3; Ps. 50:5), but here they are probably heavenly beings (cf. Job 4:18; 15:15).

The cataclysmic alteration of the earth on the Day of the Lord continues in Zechariah 14:8–10. Historically, Jerusalem owed its existence to a permanent water source, the Gihon spring. This spring provided just enough water to sustain the city in all seasons. However, the waters of Gihon all flow out into the Kidron brook, which leads to the Jordan River and the Dead Sea. Zechariah describes geographical changes in the land which would convert all of Judah, from Geba to Rimmon, south of Jerusalem, into a plain. Much of this area is mountainous, so this would require a striking transformation. In Zechariah's description, two streams originating from Jerusalem would water this vast plain. But even after the creation of the vast, well-watered plain, Jerusalem itself would remain elevated on a mountain (i.e., a defensible location), safe and inhabited (vv. 10–11). Similarly, the book of Revelation describes a transformed earth and a high-walled, holy city with gates that never close, apparently because there is no need for defense (Rev. 21:1–25).

As the spiritual consequence of His intervention, God would establish His reign. Those who have trusted Him have always regarded Him as King, but Zechariah recognizes the distinct unity and unique authority of the Lord as King over all the earth (Zech. 14:9; cf. Ps. 10:16; Is. 33:22; Jer. 10:10; Dan. 7:27). The oneness of the Lord implies that all the peoples of the earth would worship only Him. The Lord would not only intervene on behalf of His people but also send plagues to afflict those opposing Judah (Zech. 14:12). The plagues would affect even the livestock of Judah's enemies (v. 15).

Although Zechariah expected the surrounding nations to oppose the people of Judah, he also anticipated their conversion (cf. 8:22–23). The survivors of all the opposing nations would eventually go to Jerusalem to celebrate the Lord's festivals (14:16). Those failing to observe the Festival of Tabernacles would lose the seasonal rain necessary for cultivation. The possibility of disobedience and punishment suggests that this foretells what would happen if Judah remained faithful rather than serving as an unconditional eschatological prophecy.

As a result of the events of the Day of the Lord, Jerusalem would be holy. Even common vessels used for everyday purposes would be just as holy as the vessels of the temple (v. 21). A term regarding the Lord's holiness was engraved on a gold plate attached to the turban of the high priest (v. 20; cf. Ex. 28:36). On that day, every pot in Jerusalem would be holy to the Lord, and everyday utensils would be raised to sacred status (Zech. 14:21). Some versions translate the word kena'ani (lit. “Canaanite”) as “merchant,” which would indicate the end of commerce in the Lord's temple. God would accept all nations and would no longer consider anyone a foreigner.

This description of the Day of the Lord in Zechariah closes the book on a high note by proclaiming hope. The direct and personal intervention of God in human history would permanently defeat evil. Holiness would triumph over uncleanness and sin (see Lev. 16), bringing with it a glorious future in the presence of the Lord.

MALACHI

INTRODUCTION

Title. The book is named after the Prophet Malachi and contains the prophetic messages the Lord sent to Israel through him. Since the Hebrew word mal'aki means “my messenger,” some interpreters suggest that it is not a proper name. In that case, we would not know who wrote the book. But the fact that the name has a general meaning does not signify that it is not a proper name. Obadiah, for instance, means “servant of the Lord,” but it is also the name of a prophet.

Date. Malachi did not date his message, but the content of the book leaves little doubt that its author ministered during the postexilic period, possibly during middle of the 5th century B.C., which would make him a contemporary of Ezra and Nehemiah, whose books address similar issues current at the time.

Backgrounds. After his victory over the Babylonians (539 B.C.), Cyrus the Great issued an edict to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem (Ezra 1:2), bringing Israel's captivity to an end. The first batch of returnees laid the foundation in 536 B.C. Malachi must have ministered after Haggai and Zechariah, during whose time the temple was rebuilt (Ezra 6:14). The social and religious conditions reflected in Malachi's preaching closely resemble the situation faced by Ezra and Nehemiah. Malachi condemns similar abuses, such as the exploitation of widows and orphans (Mal. 3:5; cf. Neh. 5:1–13), divorces, and mixed marriages (Mal. 2:10–16; cf. Neh. 10:30; 13:23–29). Both Malachi and Nehemiah emphasize tithing as part of religious reform (Mal. 3:7–10; Neh. 10:37–39).

Authorship. Everything known about the author comes from the book itself. This commentary shares the view of a growing number of modern scholars that Malachi is the personal name of the author of the book.

Theology and Purpose. Malachi presents his message within the framework of God's covenant with His people. God gives abundant love and undeserved grace as His part within the covenant (Mal. 1:2, 9; cf. Deut. 7:7). Malachi addresses the people's response to these gifts.

1. Obedience. God expected the people to respond to His election with love, obedience (cf. Deut. 20:12–13), faithfulness (Mal. 2:14–16), and respect (1:6). Malachi prophesied because the people were not living up to the responsibilities required by this covenant relationship. The prophet assured the people of God's unfailing love, but also held them accountable for their response. God's love is unconditional, but His blessings are not. Basing his appeal on the “oneness” of God (cf. Deut. 6:4–9), Malachi calls for not only total, undivided commitment to God but also for loyalty and faithfulness in human relations, such as social justice, equality, and marriage vows (Mal. 2:9–10, 14–16).

2. The Covenant. Malachi conveys his message using covenant language, much of it borrowed from Deuteronomy. Terms such as “love,” “fear,” “faithfulness,” “law of Moses,” and “all Israel” fit the covenant context, as does Malachi's emphasis on the Levitical priesthood, tithing, and the covenant blessings and curses (2:2; 3:8–10, 12). The Lord calls His people to “remember,” a concept central to the personal relationship embedded in the covenant (4:4; cf. Deut. 4:10; 5:15; 32:7), and promises to remember those who feared Him and honored His name (Mal. 3:16).

3. Universality and Hope. Malachi contains strong elements of universality (cf. 1:5, 11, 14; 2:10; 3:12), which provide a solid basis for future hope by encouraging the reader to look back to God's original design. The universality provides a solid basis for future hope. Malachi exposes and condemns sin and warns of the fate of the unrepentant. But he also promises a better future and a faithful remnant (1:5; 2:14; 3:12, 16–18; 4:2). A future generation would experience a revival that would prepare them for the Day of the Lord (2:15; 4:5–6).

Literary Features. Malachi's style borders between prose and poetry. Following the superscription (1:1), he presents his message in a series of five disputations (i.e., oral defense of thesis using logic) between God and the people of Judah.

COMMENTARY

1:1–5

First Disputation

After a brief introduction (1:1), the book immediately moves to the first disputation, which addresses God's love for His people. The people question His love for them, and God responds (vv. 2–5).

1:1. Superscription. The superscription identifies the originator of the message (the Lord), the prophetic instrument (Malachi), the recipients (Israel), and the nature of the message (the word of the Lord). The Hebrew word massa' literally means "burden," but in this context it seems to carry the technical meaning of "oracle," a divine communication through a prophet (cf. Is. 19:1; 21:1; Nah. 1:1; Hab. 1:1). The prophets repeatedly use "the word of the Lord" to stress the divine authority and reliability of their messages. As commonly used during postexilic times, the name Israel designates the people of God in Judah.

1:2–5. God's Love for His Elect. The disputations in Malachi all follow the same basic structure: God's initial statement, the people's objection, and God's response to the objection. Here the people questioned God's love for them. The statement "I have loved you" could also be translated as "I love you." God's love is not based on any merit or inner quality of the people but on God's grace (Deut. 7:7). The people should have responded to such abundant grace with loving obedience (cf. Deut. 6:6; 10:12–13), but instead they questioned His love (Mal. 1:2).

In response, the Lord reminded them of His election of Jacob instead of Esau, as evidenced by the condition of Esau's land at that time. The strong statement "Esau I have hated" does not imply any animosity against Esau or his descendants (v. 3). Such hatred was actually prohibited in the law (Deut. 23:7). In context the phrase simply means, "I have chosen Jacob rather than Esau." The nonelection of Esau was manifested in the condition of his land at that time. The description leaves no doubt that the fate of the Edomites was connected to their sins and not predetermined by God. Their ambition to return and build up what they had lost was rejected because they were a wicked land (Mal. 1:4), against whom God's indignation/wrath would last forever. During the fifth century B.C., the Nabateans expanded their power and forced Edom further south into what in NT times was named Idumea.

The notion of God's wrath is part of an important biblical pattern. Sin and apostasy lead to retribution, which results either in repentance and purification or in condemnation. This first disputation ends, however, on a positive note of hope for the future. The people of Israel would see the Lord magnified and His greatness acknowledged beyond the border of Israel. They would proclaim Him as Lord over history. This prophecy gives the disputation a universal perspective.

1:6–2:9

Second Disputation: Honoring God's Name

The second disputation contains two dialogues in which God accuses the priests of dishonoring His name (1:6–11, 12–14), followed by a monologue affirming God's sovereignty (2:1–9).

1:6–11. First Dialogue. In this disputation, Malachi invokes the name yahweh tseba'ot ("the LORD of hosts," "the LORD Almighty," "the LORD of heavenly forces") eleven times to emphasize the divine origin of his message. The oracle opens with two proverbial sayings contrasting Israel's attitude toward God with a son who honors his father and a servant/slave who honors his master. As Israel's Father, God created and cared for them (cf. Is. 64:8; Hos. 11:1). As Israel's Master, He brought them out of Egypt, redeemed them, and became their Lord. God naturally expected respect, but His children despised/showed contempt for Him. They had shamed His name through disloyalty to the covenant.

The Hebrew word for "honor" (kabod) literally means "to be heavy." God is a person of weight, and His children should honor Him by taking what He says seriously. But the priests, who were responsible for maintaining proper worship, offered imperfect sacrifices on the Lord's table (the altar of burnt offerings). They would never have offered the Persian governor such gifts (Mal. 1:8). In this way, they despised the Lord by belittling His importance in the eyes of the people and the nations. Only a perfect sacrifice could represent the sacrifice of Christ to atone for the sins of the world. The Lord found this practice so contemptible that He wished someone would shut the doors leading to the temple complex so the priests could not offer defiled sacrifices (v. 10).

The Lord concludes by expounding on the future, when all would worship Him. His name would become great among the nations/Gentiles, a hope also reflected in the writings of previous prophets (see Is. 56:6–7). This broad, grand vision marks a stark and deliberate contrast to the petty attitude of the priests who received the message.

1:12–14. Second Dialogue. Like the first conversation, the second contains God's statement, a response, and a reference to the universal nature of the covenant. The Lord condemned the priests for treating the altar and the sacrifices as common and for complaining about their ministry, which they considered a burden instead of a privilege (Mal. 1:12–13). In response, the Lord rejected their blemished, disrespectful sacrifices. As a great King, He should be feared among the nations (vv. 13–14).

2:1–9. God's Speech. Malachi now moves from dialogue to divine monologue. "And now," introduces a judgment oracle (cf. Is. 5:5; 16:14; Jer. 18:11; Hos. 5:7). The Lord had presented evidence against the priests and would now pronounce the verdict. The word mitswah (lit. "commandment," "decree") underscores the certainty of God's verdict against the very priests expected to guard His commandments. God would curse the blessings of the priests, reversing the blessing He gave Aaron, unless they resolved (Heb. tashimu al leb, lit. "take it to heart") to honor/glorify His name (Mal. 2:2; cf. 1:6; Num. 6:24–26; cf. Deut. 28–29).

God further explained two consequences of the curse. First, God would rebuke the descendants of the priests (Mal. 2:3). Scholars dispute the vocalization of this phrase (the original Hebrew text did not contain vowels). The word translated as "descendants" could actually mean "arm," implying that God would weaken, even paralyze, the priests, making them unable to perform their duties (cf. 1 Sam. 2:31; Ps. 10:15). However, the translation "descendant" or "offspring" (lit. "seed") makes better sense. In context, the use of ga'ar ("rebuke") suggests that God would humiliate the descendants of the priests by withholding His blessings in order to hopefully preserve the covenant with Levi (Mal. 2:4). As the second consequence of the curse, God would spread refuse/dung from sacrificial animals on the faces of the priests. This gross act would not only humiliate them but also render them unclean. The priests normally removed and burned the feces from the sacrifices (Lev. 4:11–12). But because of this ritual pollution, those appointed by God to remove uncleanness would find themselves carried off from His presence and thrown out with the fecal matter of the sacrifices.

God issued this stern verdict to preserve His covenant with Levi (Mal. 2:4). Translations such as "abolish" or "fall to the ground" presuppose an unnecessary change of the Hebrew text. God positively recalled the time when Levi showed Him respect/fear and reverently stood in awe of His name (v. 5). As Levi taught the truth, his descendants, the priests, were tasked with sharing divine instruction as the messengers of the Lord (vv. 6–7). This wordplay on the meaning of Malachi's own name ("my messenger") identifies the failure of the priests. By failing to communicate God's message, they had corrupted/violated God's covenant with Levi.

God's retribution naturally followed. Just as the priests despised God's name by making His table contemptible (1:7), so would He make them contemptible and humiliate them before the people (2:9). They had failed to walk with God and had shown unfair partiality and favoritism in their implementation of the law (cf. 1:9).

2:10—3:6

Third Disputation: God's Justice and Judgment

Malachi begins the third disputation with a passionate appeal to the people (2:10). The divine indictment follows, juxtaposed with two attempts by the people to defend themselves (vv. 11–13). They first protest God's judgment and then question the fairness of His justice. God responds unambiguously with the facts about the people's behavior (vv. 14b–16, 17b). The oracle ends with a pronouncement of God's judgment: He will arrive at His temple (3:1–2), and both the priesthood (vv. 3–4) and the people (vv. 5–6) will face their fate.

2:10–13. God's Lawsuit against the People. The prophet's passionate appeal to the people in v. 10 functions as a transition to this section. Malachi condemns the partiality of the priests by citing the universal implications of the nature of Yahweh as “one God” (cf. 2:9–10; Deut. 6:4). God, not Abraham, is the one Father of all because He created us (cf. Ex. 4:22; Hos. 11:1). In the OT, only God appears as the subject of the verb bara’ (“create”). God created all humanity (Gen. 1–2), and He created His people when He delivered them from Egypt (cf. Is. 43:1, 7, 15).

Like Daniel in his prayer of penitence, Malachi includes himself among the people when he asks why “we” are treacherous/unfaithful with each other (cf. Dan. 9:4b–19). He emphasizes the brotherhood and common ancestry of the people of Israel through their collective covenant with God. Equality before God should lead to proper behavior toward each other. The Hebrew verb bagad (“to be treacherous,” “unfaithful”) occurs five times in Malachi 2:10–16, highlighting God’s condemnation of faithless behavior in marriage and social relationships. The use of metaphors from family relations is expanded by a reference to their collective covenant with God, emphasizing the brotherhood of the people of Israel with a common ancestry.

In vv. 11–13, the prophet accuses the men of Judah of marrying women who worshiped foreign gods (lit. “a daughter of a god”). The Hebrew word to’ebah (“abomination,” “detestable thing”) often refers to foreign gods or the act of marrying foreigners and worshiping their gods (see also Ezra 9:14). The abomination was not the mixed marriages but the resulting corruption of worship, as the foreign women brought pagan worship into the community. The social problem arose from the religious element. The peoples of the ancient Near East (despite ethnic differences) did not divide life into sacred and secular elements. Everything had religious implications. The people of Judah had desecrated God’s sanctuary by what some today might consider a secular act (Mal. 2:11). The women’s ethnicity did not matter, but their religious beliefs did. The Hebrew word qodesh (“holy institution,” “sanctuary,” “holy place”) may refer directly to the temple, but it may also include everything set apart for God (e.g., the temple, the city, and the people). God had expressly forbidden the Israelites from marrying foreigners because they would turn them away from God (Ex. 34:11–16; Deut. 7:3–4). Through these marriages and the pagan worship resulting from them, the people became both ceremonially and morally unclean. The prophet wished that the Lord would cut off/remove (Heb. karat) anyone acting this way from the tents of Jacob (Mal. 2:12). Karat means to expell from the worshipping community of God by exile or, in extreme cases, by execution (Gen. 17:14; Lev. 7:20, 21; 17:10; 19:8; 20:17; cf. Dan. 9:26).

Finally, Malachi reveals the utter hypocrisy of those who, though living in violation of the covenant, bring an offering to the Lord and cover the altar with tears and laments (Mal. 2:13). Immoral behavior does not necessarily prevent expressions of strong religious emotions.

2:14–17. Objections Refuted. When Malachi declared that God would no longer favorably accept their offerings, the people demanded to know the reason. He answered that they had broken their marriage vows, which rendered their expression of religious emotions worthless. Their moral life directly conflicted with the values of the covenant (see Ezra 9–10). It appears that the men had divorced their Jewish wives, the wives of their youth, in order to marry the pagan women.

God intended marriage to reflect the covenant love and faithfulness He Himself showed His people (cf. Jer. 2:2; Hos. 2:18–20). Marriage is a permanent covenant between a man and a woman with God as the witness (Mal. 2:14; cf. Prov. 2:17). God intended close intimacy between them. The word khaberet means a close friend/companion/partner with whom one shares everything.

Malachi 2:15–16 is fraught with grammatical issues that make translation difficult. Some translations apply “one” to God (the “one God”). Others apply “one” to the marriage union, referring to the Creation, when God made the first couple one. In this context, the reference to the Spirit would mean that husband and wife share the same original spiritual bond of love and understanding because God continues to be part of it. Such a union results in “godly offspring,” children taught to follow God because they have a mother and father who both have a right relationship with Him. Malachi reminded those men of Judah who had divorced their wives to take foreign wives that the spiritual dimension of their previous marriages remained because God remained as witness. In light of the original ideal of Eden, it is no wonder that God hates divorce (v. 16). Those who divorce their spouses engage in an act of treachery/disloyalty (Heb. bagad).

The people’s second objection functions as a transition and introduction to the subsequent divine speech (3:1–6). The question “Where is the God of justice?” cynically casts doubt on God’s moral integrity, prompting Him to answer.

3:1–6. God's Response: Judgment Will Come.

The Lord assured His people that He would suddenly and dramatically come to His temple to judge (cf. Pss. 96:13; 98:9; Dan. 7:22). Before His coming, He would send His messenger to prepare the way. In Hebrew, "my messenger" is the same as the name of the prophet, but the context seems to militate against any reference to Malachi himself. The messenger would announce God's arrival and encourage the people to pave the way (cf. Is. 40:3). He would proclaim peace, joy, and the good news of salvation (cf. Ps. 68:12, 18; Is. 52:7–8).

Judgment implies deliverance and often has a positive connotation in the OT. Given Judah's moral state in Malachi's time, however, the statement that the people seek the Lord and delight in/desire Him must be ironic (cf. Amos 5:18–20). The messenger of the covenant, a concept unique to Malachi, stands in clear parallel to "the Lord," suggesting that it is a name for God (more specifically, for the Messiah), not for the prophet. "Lord" here translates from the Hebrew 'adon, referring to God as the heavenly King (cf. Zech. 4:14; 6:5).

"The God of justice" would come to His sanctuary to judge, beginning with the Levites (Mal. 3:3; cf. 2:17). He would purify and refine them, bringing moral and spiritual renewal that would make the sacrifices and offerings once again ceremonially pure and acceptable/pleasing to the Lord (cf. Jer. 2:2–3). After purifying the priesthood, God would judge all the people, eradicating those who practice sorcery, commit adultery, perjure themselves, treat foreigners unjustly/turn away aliens, defraud laborers of their wages, and oppress widows and orphans.

Malachi 3:6 is a transitional verse that many consider an introduction to the following section. If so, the Hebrew conjunction ki ("for," "because"), which some versions leave untranslated, could mean "indeed." That God does not change does not mean that He is indifferent to what happens. It emphasizes that He has always been and will always continue to be the covenant God of mercy (cf. Ex. 34:6–7). Through judgment and purification, God shows grace to the descendants of Jacob, saving them from destruction though they are wayward deceivers just like their ancestor.

3:7–12*Fourth Disputation: The Practical Benefits of Repentance

The fourth disputation plays off of the reference to Jacob in 3:6, equating the attitude and behavior of the people to that of their ancestors.

This leads into a divine call for the people of Malachi's time to return to the Lord, followed by their response (v. 7). The central part of the disputation covers the covenant curses and blessings associated with the laws of tithes and offerings. The phrase amar yahweh tseba'ot ("says the LORD of hosts," "says the LORD Almighty," "says the LORD of heavenly forces") highlights Malachi's prophetic authority.

3:7–9. The Past and the Present: Tithing. The people continued to turn away from God's decrees and ordinances, as they had since the time of their fathers/ancestors. The Lord begins the discussion by appealing to the people to return to Him, the typical OT expression for conversion. If the people would return to God, God would return to them. Both parties would stop walking away from each other.

The people responded immediately by asking in what way/how they should return, an apparent claim of innocence denying that they had done anything that required repentance. The Lord responded with a clear example: they had robbed Him. When they again asked in what way/how they had robbed Him, God replied that they had cheated Him "in tithes and offerings." This had brought the covenant curses on them (vv. 8–9). A tithe (lit. "a tenth") refers to the divine law requiring the Israelites to give a tenth of their income or spoil to the Lord (Gen. 14:18–20; 28:20–22; Lev. 27:30–33). An offering refers to any gift carried to the temple.

3:10–12. The Tithe and Blessings. God appealed to the people a second time, this time to supply His house with food by bringing all the tithes/the full tithe into the storehouse (i.e., the temple treasury). God set this up as a test. If the people would faithfully bring in the tithes and offerings, He would open heaven and pour out His blessings, proving that He alone supplies all His children need (see "Covenant Renewal and Tithing," p. 602). This reciprocal movement connects the earthly sanctuary with the heavenly sanctuary, the location of God's throne room.

The practice of tithing, already introduced in Genesis, relates closely to the concept of blessing (Gen. 14:18–20; 28:20–22). This sermon in Malachi reflects the theological message of these accounts from the origin of Israel. Tithing is not about paying God, and blessing is not about God automatically repaying the giver. Jacob had to learn that tithing involves more than a simple trading contract (Gen. 27:20; 32:27–30).

Like marriage, it is a covenant based on mutual grace, love, faithfulness, trust, and commitment (see Mal. 2:11–16). God's people should bring Him tithes and offerings as an expression of gratitude for His undeserved mercy, responding to His initiative by returning a portion of what He has already given them.

God's promise to bless the fertility of the land resembles the covenant blessings in Deuteronomy (Mal. 3:11–12; Deut. 28:12–13; 30:8–10). God's blessings again have universal implications, indicating that He was about to fulfill His promise to make Abraham a blessing to all people (Mal. 3:12; Gen 12:3; cf. Mal. 1:5, 12; 2:10).

3:13—4:3

Fifth Disputation: Benefits of Serving God

The fifth disputation begins by contrasting two groups with two very different attitudes concerning judgment. The Lord characterized each group by its words. The first group argued with God's assessment of them (3:13–15). God never directly replies to their objections. Instead, He turns His focus to the second group, those who feared Him and trusted His plans for them (vv. 16–17). The section ends with God explaining what would happen to these two groups in the judgment to come (3:18—4:3).

3:13–15. Speech of the People. The Lord charged the people with speaking harsh, arrogant words against Him, claiming that it is useless/futile to serve Him. They treated God's commands as a means to gain profit/benefit for themselves, so they considered serving Him a drudgery that brought only sorrow and mourning (3:14). By calling the arrogant/proud blessed, they mocked God's promise that all the nations would call His people blessed (vv. 12, 15). By proclaiming that the arrogant and wicked successfully get away with tempting/testing (Heb. bakhan) God, they mocked God's plea to try/test (bakhan) Him through tithing (vv. 10, 15). Since God did not intervene, they stopped caring.

3:16–17. Those Who Fear God. Following the dialogue of the previous section, verse 3:16 switches to prophetic monologue. Malachi portrays those who respond favorably to God's message as people who fear the Lord (i.e., honor Him) and khashab His name. This Hebrew word, sometimes translated as "meditate," means to esteem and value (cf. Is. 13:17).

It contrasts with the attitude exhibited by the priests (Mal. 1:6, 11). The Lord does not accept the worship of the rebellious (1:8, 10, 13), but He listens to those who fear Him.

Malachi describes a scroll/book of remembrance written in God's presence in His heavenly sanctuary concerning the words and actions of those who fear the Lord. The Bible speaks about several heavenly books, most significantly the Book of Life, which records the names of those who believe (Ex. 32:32–33; Ps. 69:28; Dan. 12:1). The mention of a "book/scroll of remembrance" is unique to Malachi. This may refer to the Book of Life, but it more likely refers to a book of deeds (cf. Esth. 2:23; 6:1). The word "remembrance" underlines the fact that God does not forget anyone or anything. Those who fear the Lord would become His special possession and receive their reward on the day of judgment (Mal. 3:17; cf. Ex. 19:5). Because they are so precious to Him, He will spare them.

3:18—4:3. Two Destinies. The Lord proclaimed that the fire of purification would burn on the day of judgment to destroy the arrogant and wicked, those who do not serve Him. The fire would burn them completely, leaving neither root nor branch (4:1; cf. 3:2–3, 18). There is no "soul" burning in an eternal torment. This contrasts with the fate of those who fear God's name, who would leap and jump for joy (Heb. push, "leap," "gallop," "frolic," sometimes translated as "grow"; cf. Hab. 1:8), like calves running free in the field, and trample the ashes of the wicked (Mal. 4:2–3; cf. 3:16).

The phrase "Sun of Righteousness" occurs only here in the OT. The authors of the Bible hesitated to associate the sun with God, mainly because of the prevalence of pagan sun worship (but see Ps. 84:11; Is. 60:1–3). Here the image portrays the dawn of a new day in which the rays/wings of the sun bring healing. "Righteousness" often describes God's merciful intervention in the life of His people to save and deliver them (Pss. 96:10–13; 97:4; 98:1–2; Is. 56:1; cf. Rom. 3:21–22). God's new day of righteousness would bring life and joy. The saved ones are compared to calves: they would push. The idea is that the people would leap and jump for joy like calves running freely on a field after leaving their stall. They would trample the ashes of the wicked. This image also connects to Malachi 4:1, which states that the proud would be completely burned. There is no "soul" burning in eternal torment.

4:4–6*Final Appeal

The book of Malachi concludes with the Lord's final appeal to the people. It summarizes and weaves together major themes of the previous disputations and connects them with the larger theological setting.

4:4. Remember the Law. God exhorted the people to “remember” the law. A key concept in God's covenant with Israel, remembering means more than just mentally recalling the event (Ex. 13:3; 20:8; Deut. 5:15; 24:18). It means reacting appropriately to the recollection, in this case by obeying the law (cf. Ps. 103:18). The law of Moses broadly encompasses all of God's revelation at Mount Sinai. Together with the khuqqim (“statutes,” “decrees”) and mishpatim (“judgments,” “laws”), it designates the law in its totality (cf. Lev. 26:46). Horeb is another name for Sinai (Ex. 33:6). These repeated references to the covenant make this exhortation to remember the law a natural, final summary of God's intention for His people (Mal. 1:6; 2:6; 3:7, 14).

4:5–6. The Coming of Elijah. The Lord moves from a discussion of the law to prophecy, combining the references to the past with expectations for the future. He promised to send the prophet Elijah to prepare the way for the Day of the Lord. Elijah, as the typical prophet for spiritual renewal, represents the messenger prophesied in 3:1. Jesus applied this text to John the Baptist, who came “in the spirit and power of Elijah” (Luke 1:17) to prepare the way for Jesus (Matt. 3:1–12; 17:12–13). The announcement of the coming of the “great and dreadful day of the LORD” clearly links it to previous descriptions of God's intervention (Mal. 3:2; cf. Joel 2:31). In Malachi, by the pairing of law and prophecy, the reference to the past combines with the expectations of the future.

The prophetic messenger would turn the hearts of the parents (lit. “fathers”) to the children and the hearts of the children to the parents. This description expands on the function of the messenger in 3:1 by describing how the messenger would prepare the way for the Lord. Malachi uses several family metaphors and references to fathers/ancestors (see 1:6; 2:6, 10), but God promises more than bridging generational gaps. He promises a return to His original covenant made with the fathers/ancestors at Sinai. Hence the call to remember serves as a call for His people to return to the faith of their ancestors. The mutual turning of hearts between parents and children indicates the two temporal directions of law and prophecy, both past and future. The appeal closes with a warning that God would strike the earth/land with a curse if the people rejected the message. The “earth” could refer to the land of Israel, or in view of Malachi's proclamation of the universality of the God of Israel, it could refer to the entire world.

Christians place Malachi as the last book of the OT. It fittingly ends without closure, looking to the future. The Lord promised blessings to come but also warned the impenitent. He commanded His people to remain in His family, to keep His law, to listen to His prophets, and to honor and praise Him (3:16). The book closes with the potential for either judgment or salvation, leaving the last word yet unspoken. There is still hope.